forced is a tyrannical usurpation by the courts. We cannot reasonably presume that the distinguished court which rendered the decision of Foedick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235, 25 L. ed. 839, and subsequent decisions in line with it, did not clearly perceive the full force of the argument and "abstract equity" now insisted upon successfully for the first time in this or any other court (at least, within the knowledge of the writer), and apprehend the nature and consequences involved. That court did not attempt to justify the new rule adopted upon the ground that the petitioners had an abstract equity, perfect in itself, superior to the bondholders, but based its conclusion upon the power of the court to impose conditions precedent to the appointment of receivers and the granting of equitable relief, and justified the imposition of these conditions because of the public character of railroad corporations, and limited its application to such enterprises, and to cases in which the mortgagee applied to courts of equity for affirmative relief. In the case of Kneeland v. American Loan & T. Co., 136 U. S. 89, 34 L. ed. 879, that court has already issued its warning that the rule will not be extended to other than the exceptional case specified, and reaffirmed the established doctrine, in the following language: "No one is bound to sell to a railroad company, or to work for it; and whoever has dealings with a company whose property is mortgaged must be assumed to have dealt with it on the faith of its personal responsibility, and not in expectation of subsequently displacing the priority of the mortgage lien." How is it possible to reconcile the doctrine enunciated in 136 U. S. 89, 34 L. ed. 879, with that enunciated in the case at bar, where the rule is applied to "improvements which add value, in a sense permanent, to the property," and which holds that, if the income has been otherwise expended, then these claims become a prior lien upon "corpus" to which the labor or materials of claimants contributed nothing, and which originally constituted the security of the mortgage? The writer cannot sanction as sound a rule of equity which annuls (usually termed "displaces") existing relations between a mortgagor and mortgagee, in the interest of a third party, whose interest was acquired against the mortgagor subsequent to and with a full knowledge of the rights of the mortgagee. The justification of the courts, denying a mortgagee his priority, has been rested mainly upon—First, the equitable doctrine that he who seeks equity must do equity; and, secondly, upon the equitable doctrine of estoppel; and, thirdly, that the claim is one of abstract right, arising from certain conditions and circumstances. As to the first of these propositions, that he who seeks the aid of a court of equity must do equity, the rule operates only between the parties to an agreement or transaction, to prevent the one from taking an undue advantage of another, but cannot be invoked by a stranger, who is not even a proper party to the suit. But the argument assumes the question in controversy, and that is that these claimants have an equity peculiar to them, because of the character of the claims. These claims must necessarily arise either from contract, express or implied, or from statute, or result into such superior claims, as matter of law from facts. It is not pretended that the right is of statutory creation, or of contract between the parties, the mortgagee and labor or materialman creditor, nor between the mortgagor, as the agent of the mortgagee, and the labor or material creditor. Is it a conclusion of law that a mortgagee guarantees to labor and materialmen that the business of the company or corporation will be conducted on business principles, and the company never become insolvent? Is it a conclusion of law that a mortgagee's lien shall be subordinate to claims for labor and material? Is it a conclusion of law that a lien upon incomes acquired by solemn contract is subordinate to such claims? And, on the other hand, is the right of the laborer or materialman made by law to depend upon the skill and judgment of the employer, so that, if permanent injury results, his claim becomes thereby of a higher and superior character? Or does it depend upon how the gross income be expended by the employer? If this be law, it is because the courts make it law, and in no sense is it the application of any just principle. Contracts for labor and material, unaided by special provision of the contract or statute, stand on no higher ground than other simple contract creditors, and are no more entitled to the income than the latter creditors. Labor and material claimants have as much right to have a simple contract creditor, to whom income has been paid, declared a trustee for their benefit, as to have a mortgagee, who has a lien upon it, to whom it has been paid, declared such trustee. There is not a single element of an estoppel in the whole matter. Neither the laborer nor the materialman act or refrain from acting at the instance of the mortgagee. It is a question of contract between them and the mortgagor, in a matter not under the control or supervision of the mortgagee, and rendered with a full knowledge of the mortgagee's lien. It would require affirmative action on the part of the mortgagee, inducing the labor and purchase, to raise an estoppel against him.

The new doctrine is a revolution in jurisprudence, subverting settled principles, and not the application of new remedies to existing rights, and it should be walled into the "exceptional cases" declared to be such by Mr. Justice Brewer in Kneeland's Case, 136 U. S. 89, 34 L. ed. 879, and reasserted in Thomas v. Western Car Co. 149 U. S. 95, 37 L. ed. 668. In the case of Wood v. Guarantee Trust & S. D. Co. 128 U. S. 416, 421, 32 L. ed. 472, 473, it was declared that three conditions must exist, to justify the application of the rule of Foedick v. Schall: First, it must be applied wholly to "operating expenses;" second, and only where there is a "diversion of the income of a going concern;" and, third, "that it had never been applied in any case except that of a railroad, and that there was a broad distinction between such a case and that of a purely private concern." In the case of National Bank v. Carolina, K. & W. R. Co. 63 Fed. Rep. 25, the application of the rule is limited to railroads. It is said: "The theory of this equity is this: It is the interest as well of the public as of all parties interested in a railroad that it be kept a going concern. To do this, there must be a ready supply of labor and materials necessary to this end. If persons who give labor and materials were required in every instance to make careful examination into the condition of the company, so as to ascertain its solvent capacity for paying debts, all of its operations might be brought to a standstill. For this reason, persons dealing with a company are encouraged to do so, with the knowledge that the court will see that all such supplies of labor and material given, and not paid for within a reasonable period before the appointment of a receiver, will be provided for by the court.

. . . But, in exercising this equity, the court goes upon dangerous ground, and therefore proceeds cautiously, keeping rigidly within prescribed limits." In the case of Hanna v. State Trust Co. 38 U. S. App. 61, 16 C. C. A. 586, 70 Fed. Rep. 2, 30 L. R. A. 201, an attempt was made to invoke and apply the rule of Posdick v. Shall to a private company or corporation. It was said: "The doctrine of these cases has no application to this case. They rest on the peculiar character of railroad property and of a railroad corporation. The distinction between railroad corporations which are of a quasi public character, and purely private corporations, has been often pointed out.

. . . It is enough to say that the supreme court itself has said that the doctrine of the cases cited has only been applied in railroad cases." A lengthy quotation is made in the opinion from the case of Raht v. Attrill, 106 N. Y. 423, 60 Am. Rep. 456, in point, and quite a number of decisions from other courts are also cited. In Coe v. New Jersey Midland R. Co. 31 N. J. Eq. 105, the question of the application of the rule to private business enterprises, and the consequences, are fully discussed and disapproved; also in Poland v. Lamolille Valley R. Co. 52 Vt. 144. Without a single exception, so far as the writer has been able to ascertain after a most diligent investigation, the courts are uniform in applying and limiting the rule wholly to railroad cases; and in the case of Thomas v. Western Car Co. 149 U. S. 95, 37 L. ed. 663, believed to be the last utterance by the Supreme Court of the United States on the question, a lengthy quotation is made from the Case of Kneeland, 136 U. S. 89, 34 L. ed. 379, in which the warning given in that case, and the limitation placed upon the rule, were repeated with approbation and reasserted. The application of the rule was denied as to manufacturing corporations, in Fidelity Ins. & S. D. Co. v. Shenandoah Iron Co. 42 Fed. Rep. 372, and in Seventh Nat. Bank v. Shenandoah Iron Co. 35 Fed. Rep. 436. In 2 Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 861, p. 1402, it is said the rule "is extraordinary," and "does not apply to manufacturing companies." The principle is criticised as to its application in railroad cases, and it is held that it "plainly impairs the obligation of the mortgage contract," by the following eminent texts: Wait, Insolvent Corp. §§ 290, 291; Beach, Receivers, §§ 391-393; High, Receivers, § 394a; Jones, Corporate Bonds, § 555. Surely the rule ought not to be extended by adjudications of a court, as it has been in the case before us, in the face of such high authority, and in defiance of the obligation of contracts. If the equitable right exist as an abstract right, the parties themselves can come into the courts and insist upon its protection, and need not wait for the bondholder or mortgagee. That I have not overstated the position of this court may be seen by a reference to the case of Merchants' Bank v. Moore, 106 Ala. 646, which the present opinion and decision of the court declare to be unsound. In that case there was no question of a bondholder or prior lien claimed by contract. A general creditors' bill was filed on behalf of all creditors, and a decree rendered, which declared a conveyance made by the defendant in favor of certain creditors to be a general assignment for the like benefit of all creditors. The defendant debtor had been engaged in sawing and planing lumber for a market,—a mere private business concern. It was not continued or asked to be continued as a "going concern." Moore et al. filed their petition, in which they claimed that the company was indebted to them for labor and materials which entered into the "permanent improvement" of the property which had been assigned for the benefit of creditors, and which fact, petitioners asserted, gave them a priority over the other general creditors. There was no claim of priority by virtue of any contract or statutory lien, but the contention was based purely and solely upon the one fact,—that their labor and materials entered into the permanent improvement of the property. This court held that these facts did not entitle them to a priority over the other creditors. Certainly this has been the uniform holding of this court, under like circumstances, from its organization; and now it is proposed to declare different principles, and annul a long-established rule of parties contracting on personal credit, and lay down the new rule that labor performed or materials furnished, which enter into the improvement of property, creates a perfect equity, which entitles that class of creditors to a priority over other creditors without regard to the terms of the contract or provisions of statutes. The very improvements may have been the basis of credit, and the credit given without any notice or knowledge of the existence of claims for labor or material. The writer of the opinion in the case of Merchants' Bank v. Moore, 106 Ala. 646, did not at the time suppose there was any conflict between that case and that of Lehman Bros. v. Tallassee Mfg. Co. 64 Ala. 567, and, after a careful re-examination, believes it to be demonstrable beyond reasonable controversy that there is no conflict upon any issue involved and decided in these cases. In the case of Lehman Bros. v. Tallassee Mfg. Co. there were three different creditors, who appealed from the decree of the chancery court to this court,—Lehman Bros., Clopton et al. and Stone & Clopton. Lehman Bros. appealed upon the grounds that the chancery court held that they were not bona fide holders of certain bonds which were in their hands as collateral security, and that Lehman Bros. & Co. were not entitled to the benefit of this security. There was no contest between the bondholders and mortgagees and Clopton et al. On the contrary the bondholders acceded to the claim of Clopton et al., and consented, so far as they were concerned, to the granting of the payment of this claim. The claim of Stone & Clopton was for the allowance of attorney's fees out of the general fund, not covered by any mortgage. The chancery court disallowed this claim. The other claim was that of Clopton, Goldthwaite et al., and arose from the following facts: The Tallassee Manufacturing Company was financially pressed, and unable to raise money. It had hypothecated certain cotton, which was needed for manufacturing purposes. It was at that time a "going concern." In order to release the cotton, and get possession of it for the use and benefit of the company, with the consent of the trustees and assignees, and with the understanding had with these parties that they were to be repaid, as appears from the pleadings, these parties, upon their individual responsibility, raised the money for the purpose of releasing the cotton. There was no litigation in the case, whatever, between the bondholders and mortgagees, on the one hand, and other creditors, but the contest was solely between general creditors; the petitioners, as such, claiming priority of payment over other unsecured creditors, upon the facts stated, just as in the case of Merchants' Bank v. Moore, 106 Ala. 646, out of the property, or proceeds of property, not covered by any mortgage or lien. It was conceded throughout the opinion, and by all the creditors, that the bondholders were entitled to everything covered by their mortgage; and the opinion of the court was careful to keep separate, not only the property itself covered by the mortgage, but the income from this source so far as it could be separated from the income derived from property not mortgaged for the benefit of the bondholder. The phase of the litigation applicable to the case under consideration arose only between unsecured creditors, as to their rights in the property, and the income from property not included in the mortgage. Clopton Goldthwaite et al., claimed that the facts gave them a preference over the other unsecured creditors, as to the property not included in the mortgage. They set up no claim to property covered by the mortgage. The chancery court denied their right to any preference whatever. This ruling was affirmed on appeal. The one or the other of the two conclusions follows,—either that the claim of Clopton, Goldthwaite et al., was not a claim similar to that preferred by Moore et al., in Merchants' Bank v. Moore, 106 Ala. 646, or if it was similar, then the decision of this court affirming the decision of the chancery court, which had denied and refused to decree a priority to petitioner, is directly in harmony with the case of Merchants' Bank v. Moore, and directly at variance with the new doctrine. On the other hand, if the claim of Clopton, Goldthwaite et al., was not of a similar character, and did not rest upon like circumstances, the decision is not an authority upon the question as issue, for there was no such question before the court to be adjudicated. The only ground for the reversal of the case in Lehman Bros. v. Tallassee Mfg. Co. 64 Ala. 567, was the error of the chancery court in holding that Lehman Bros. were not bona fide holders of the bonds. In all other respects the case was affirmed. It is impossible to find any conflict in the case of Merchants' Bank v. Moore, 106 Ala. 646, and Lehman

Bros. v. Tallassee Mfg. Co. 64 Ala. 567, as to any issue involved in either case. The writer is aware that counsel for Clopton, Goldthwaite et al., in written argument filed, insisted that their claim was within the principle declared in Fosdick v. Schall, and cited that case in their brief; and this no doubt led to a discussion, in the opinion of this court, to some extent, of that case and the principle insisted upon; but it is apparent that this court did not apply or undertake to enforce the doctrine in Lehman Bros. v. Tallassee Mfg. Co. for the priority of the claim was denied. What was said in the opinion as to extending the rule of Fosdick v. Schall to manufacturing enterprises was merely dictum. It will also be seen that the court placed the power of the court to grant the relief, not upon any abstract right or equity of claimants, but its authority to require a concession, as a condition precedent to granting relief. In the carefully considered case of Meyer v. Johnston, 58 Ala. 237, many of the principles involved in this discussion arose. On page 828 the rights and property embraced in the mortgage were considered. The mortgage conveyed all property, real and personal, then owned, or which might thereafter be owned, and all "tolls, incomes, and profits." This court reaffirmed the validity of such conveyances, and declared that the rights of the mortgagees were superior to subsequent claims for improvements, and even for the construction and completion of the railroad itself. Extensive quotations were made from the cases of Dunham v. Cincinnati, P. & C. R. Co. 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 254, 17 L. ed. 584, and Galveston, H. & H. R. Co. v. Cowdrey, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 481, 20 L. ed. 206, which are directly in point, and many other authorities were cited. In the case of Cowdrey, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 481, 20 L. ed. 206, the claim rested upon the fact that it was for iron laid upon the road, and capital applied to the road, without which the road could not have been operated. The court held the claim subordinate to that of the mortgagee. As a conclusion, the court used the following language: "If the railroad company itself, the corporation created by the state to build, equip, and operate a work useful to the public, though belonging to the company, cannot, when its enterprise is about to fail, and its labor and expenditures to be lost, give to those who shall then come to its aid, and help to complete it obligations which . . . shall have priority over others previously contracted,—what prerogative of a court of equity entitles the chancellor to step in and do so instead of the company? The company may not do so, because, holding that contracts should be inviolable, the law will not permit the obligation of them to be impaired." On page 352 this court expressly repudiated the doctrine that the mortgagee could be charged with improvements put upon the mortgaged property. The opinion, as a whole, is in direct conflict with the principle now being asserted.

It is clear, from the authorities of this state and elsewhere, that when the Mary Lee Coal & Railway Company executed its mortgage to the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company, its mortgage was valid as a conveyance upon all its property, and upon "income and tolls," and that this principle of law entered into, as a constituent of, that contract. That this prior right, acquired by a solemn contract, cannot be displaced in favor of the claims of petitioners subsequently accruing, and which, in the absence of agreement, must be presumed to have been rendered upon the personal obligation of the mortgagor, without impairing the obligation of the mortgage contract, is too clear to admit of controversy. It is the doctrine of all the courts. Even in the cases where the rule has been enforced against a prior mortgage, the courts concede that the effect of the application of the rule is to "displace" prior liens, and the "displacement" is justified solely upon the ground that courts of equity may demand from the mortgagee, as a condition precedent to relief, either in the appointment of a receiver, or foreclosure, that he concede or consent to the final payment of the claim of the laborer and materialman, although, by virtue of the mortgage, the lien, in fact and in law, is prior and superior to any claim for labor or supplies; realizing that the priority could not be adjudicated upon any principle of "abstract equity." So apparent was it that the innovation impaired the obligation of contracts, the courts limited the application of the "condition precedent" to railroads, because of their public character, and to "going railroads," and where there was a "diversion" of income. How it can be that the application of assets, whether money or property, to the satisfaction of a mortgage, which, by valid contract known to all parties, is a first lien upon it, is a "diversion" of assets, remains yet to be sustained. There is much force in the position that the public have great interest in railroads, and that no one should be allowed to strike down, without warning, the public interest. This question is one not simply of debtor and creditor, growing out of contract, but of commerce itself. Many states have provided for these conditions by statute, and saved their courts from the imputation of "court-made law." Central Trust Co. v. Thurman, 84 Ga. 735. Whether the same results as to impairing the obligations of contracts would follow as to railroad mortgages executed since the promulgation of the rule of Fosdick v. Schall, we need not now consider. We have no such case before us. In the case of Meyer v. Johnston, the same distinction was drawn as to railroad corporations, on the ground that the public were interested in such enterprises, as that drawn in Fosdick v. Schall; and upon this ground the giving of a prior lien to receiver's certificates was upheld. It is said that when Meyer v. Johnston was rendered the case of Fosdick v. Schall had not been established. That is no argument. The same equity existed then, and it was directly repudiated. But that argument is further stripped of all force when we consider the final determination of the case. The law of this state at that time required this court, on a second appeal, to render judgment without being bound by the first appeal. When the case of Meyer v. Johnston came up on a second appeal (64 Ala. 603), it seems that the opinion in the case of Fosdick v. Schall had been delivered. We cannot doubt that the learned counsel representing the interests which had been adversely decided would have availed themselves of the new doctrine, had it been supposed to have been so far-reaching. The same members of the court presided on the first appeal as on the second, and also when the case of Lehman Bros. v. Tallassee Mfg. Co. 64 Ala. 567, was decided. What the attitude of this court should be when a case like that of Fosdick v. Schall comes before it, need not now be considered; but in my opinion the rule cannot be extended to cases like that before us, without violating the sacredness of contracts. The rule declared in Merchants' Bank v. Moore, 106 Ala. 646, which strictly followed the decision of Meyer v. Johnston, ought to be adhered to. Certainly, if there was any conflict between the case of Merchants' Bank v. Moore and the case of Lehman Bros. v. Tallassee Mfg. Co., the same conflict exists between the latter case and the case of Meyer v. Johnston, and which, if there be such conflict, was virtually overruled, without any reference to it. In my opinion, there was no conflict in any of the decisions previous to that rendered in the case at bar.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

H. B. ROGERS, Exr., etc., of T. J. Rogers, Deceased, Appt.,
v.

GALLOWAY FEMALE COLLEGE et al.

(.....Ark.....)

1. A contract to establish a college "at" a certain town does not require that it should be placed within the corporate limits.

2. A contract to establish a college "in" a certain town does not require it to be placed within the corporate limits when a large number of the inhabitants of the town dwell beyond such limits.

NOTE.—As to validity of subscription contracts, see First Presby. Church v. Cooper (N. Y.) 3 L. R. A. 468, and cases cited in note.

For gift by promissory note, see Richardson v. Richardson (Ill.) 26 L. R. A. 305.

3. A binding contract is made by a subscription to secure the location of a college at a certain town when the required amount is subscribed, and the subscription accepted, and the college located at that place, while agencies are constituted and put to work to carry out the enterprise.

4. One will not be heard to deny the existence of facts which he, either in express terms or by conduct, has represented as existing, and which he intended to be acted upon by another in a certain way, and which was so acted upon in good faith by the other to his detriment.

5. A subscriber to a fund to be given for securing the location of a college at a certain place on condition that a specified sum is raised cannot avoid his subscription by showing a deficiency in the amount after it has been accepted as sufficient by the party establishing the college when he was a leading spirit in the enterprise, knew the subscribers, and knew what was demanded.

6. A private understanding with one of four persons who make equal subscriptions, to the effect that other persons will raise and pay a part of his subscription, will not release one of the other four, where this agreement did not amount to a release of the subscriber from any part of his subscription.

7. Agencies representing a church committee for the express purpose of enforcing subscriptions have no authority to vary the terms of the contract of a subscriber.

8. A college established by a church pursuant to subscriptions and propositions therefor is the beneficiary of the subscriptions, standing in loco ecclesiae as to the right to sue upon it.

(January 22, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Chancery Court for White County in favor of plaintiff in a suit brought to enforce payment of a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Cockrill & Cockrill, for appellant:

There can be no recovery upon the note sued on because the college was located outside the town of Searcy.

The language of the contract imports that the money was payable upon condition.

2 Parsons, Contr. § 527; Turner v. Baker, 30 Ark. 186.

The condition was that the college should be located within the corporate limits of Searcy.

Williams v. Fort Worth & N. O. R. Co. 82 Tex. 553; Annapolis & E. R. Co. v. Baltimore F. Ins. Co. 32 Md. 37, 3 Am. Rep. 112.

At a town means at some place within the town, rather than a place without, or even at the utmost verge of, but not in the town.

Here the contract specifies that the college should be located in Searcy. The location beyond the corporate limits of Searcy was a violation of the express condition of the contract, and was fatal to a recovery upon it.

There could be no recovery upon the note because the condition that there should be a total subscription of $25,000 was not complied with.

When a party claims to recover on the ground of having performed a condition precedent, the burden of proving such performance is on him; and the performance must be satisfactorily established.

Where subscriptions are made under an agreement that they are not to be binding unless a specified sum is subscribed, it is essential that there should be no conditions as to the liability of any of the subscribers not applicable to all.

Blodgett v. Morrill, 20 Vt. 509

Confidential subscriptions, made for the purpose of making up the required sum, are a fraud upon the other subscribers, and should not be treated as valid subscriptions.

All the negotiations were with the Methodist Church, and there is not a syllable of evidence that it was then contemplated that the subscribers should deal with a corporation. It cannot be said that the contract was made for the benefit of a person whose existence was not contemplated, and such a person cannot sue upon it.

Messrs. J. N. Cypert, Green & Hicks, W. B. Smith, and J. W. House, for appellees:

The original undertaking was to locate the college "at" Searcy and not "in" Searcy. The insertion of the word "in" instead of "at" in the note, with the fraudulent purpose of ingrafting new conditions in the contract, the terms of which had already been defined and understood, was a fraud upon the subscribers and the church, and the note should be reformed so as to conform to the original undertaking.

By accepting the subscription and agreeing to locate the college at Searcy, the church had promised something upon its part, it had assumed an obligation, it had suffered an inconvenience, it had done something to its detriment. The subscribers were the recipients of this obligation. It was not a mere offer upon the part of the subscribers to make a gift, they were getting something in return.

Greer authorized the subscription and signed the note for $2,500 in order to hold the other three, so this would make Greer responsible for $2,500, in any event just as much so as either one of the other three. He could not be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong. If he could take no advantage, Skillern, Yarnell, and Rogers were not injured, their liability had not been increased nor diminished, hence they had no right to complain.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was to recover of one T. J. Rogers, $2,500, the amount of a subscription to the Methodist Episcopal Church South, alleged to have been given for the purpose of locating, building, and maintaining a female college at the town of Searcy. The defense was that the promise was made on three conditions, viz.:

"(1) That three citizens of Searcy, other than himself, should subscribe $2,500 each; (2) that an aggregate of not less than $25,000 should be subscribed by the citizens of Searcy; and (3) that the college should be located within the then corporate limits of the town of Searcy,"—neither of which had been performed; also (4) that the offer to subscribe was withdrawn before it was accepted; and (5) that there could be no recovery upon the original subscription. We will consider these in the order they are presented by counsel.

First. Was the subscription upon condition that the college should be located "within the corporate limits of Searcy?" The chancellor found "that Thos. J. Rogers, in his lifetime, to wit, on or about the 27th day of February, 1888, subscribed the sum of $2,500 for the purpose of inducing the location, building, and maintaining a college for the education of females 'at' the town of Searcy," etc. In the latter part of the year 1887 the Methodist Episcopal Church South, through its three annual conferences of the state, appointed a committee, "with unrestricted authority," "to consider the educational interests of the church in Arkansas, and to provide for the establishment of a female college, to be under the patronage of the said conferences." Several towns of the state were spoken of as suitable for the location of such a college, and were competitors for it. Among the number was Searcy. A few of its citizens invited Bishop Galloway, who was the presiding bishop of the conferences in Arkansas, to deliver an address at 89 L. R. A.

Searcy, which he did on Sunday, the 26th day of February, 1888. At the close of his address he gave an opportunity to the people there assembled to subscribe to a fund for the purpose above indicated. Eugene Cypert acted as secretary or recorder, putting down the names of the subscribers and the amounts subscribed. The bishop stated that he "thought a bonus of $25,000 was necessary," and that, while he could not "speak authoritatively for the commission," he "felt sure that bonus would secure the college." Much testimony has been adduced pro and con upon the question of whether the bishop, in making the proposition, and Rogers in accepting it, for a subscription to the location of a college, used the words, "in Searcy" or, the words "at Searcy." As to what particular words were employed is purely a question of fact. The proof is ample to support the finding of the chancellor that "at Searcy" was used. But it is argued that Rogers subscribed upon condition that the college was to be located "in Searcy," meaning "within the corporate limits," and that such was the contract even if "at" instead of "in" was employed to express it. The preposition "at," "when used to denote local position, may mean 'in, on, near by,' etc., according to the context, denoting usually a place conceived of as a mere point; . . . so with names of towns, . . . as, at Stratford, at Lexington. . . . But if the city is of great size, 'in' is commonly used; as, in London. . . . Unless, again, the city is conceived of as a mere geographical point; as, our financial interests center 'at' New York." Century Dict., At. "With the names of cities and towns the use of 'at' or 'in' depends, not chiefly upon the size of the place, but upon the point of view. When we think merely of the local or geographical point, we use 'at'; when we think of inclusive space, we employ 'in,'—as, we arrived at Liverpool; there are a few rich men in this village." Standard Dict., At. "Primarily, this word 'at' expresses the relations of presence, nearness in place. . . . It is less definite than in or on; at the house may be in or near the house." Webster, Dict., At. To determine the true sense in which words are used, we must consider the subject-matter concerning which they are used, and the circumstances calling for their application to any given subject. State v. Old Town Bridge Corp. 85 Me. 17; Harris v. State, Dolan, 72 Miss. 964, 38 L. R. A. 85.

The Methodist Episcopal Church South had in view the establishment of a college at some eligible town or city in the state that would offer a sufficient consideration in money to be used in erecting a college building. The church had no funds for that purpose, and was dependent upon such donations as might be offered by citizens of the town or city seeking the location of the college. The question uppermost in the minds of the representatives of the church was to raise as a consideration for the college location the sum of $25,000. The proposition of locating the college within or without the corporate limits of the town or city securing the location thereof was never thought of by those who spoke for the church until after the subscription list had been tendered and accepted. Bishop Galloway testified on this point: "I do not remember that he [Rogers] asked me any question about the location inside or outside the corporate limits of Searcy. I do not think it was presented to me, or mentioned by me, when the subscriptions were taken." Many witnesses testify to the same effect, and there is no proof to the contrary. Mr. Rogers was a man of large possessions in realty in the town of Searcy and in the county of White. He was an enterprising citizen, "and manifested great interest in this project, as he usually did in all enterprises he undertook." He was present at a preliminary meeting of the citizens a few nights before the day he subscribed, announcing that he would give as much towards securing the college as anyone else, and urging with his accustomed zeal and energy other citizens to become subscribers, and to say what they would give. At a meeting of the subscribers and other citizens on the day following the Sunday meeting, Rogers was present. This meeting was for the double purpose of ratifying what had been done the day before, and to complete the subscription list for $25,000, the amount required to secure the location. The secretary of this meeting was instructed to compose "a caption for the subscription list descriptive of the list and its purposes." That caption reads: "Following is a list of those who have subscribed for the purpose of securing the location of the Methodist State Female College at Searcy, the amounts by them respectively subscribed being set opposite their names." It was expressly mentioned and understood at this meeting, in the presence of Rogers, that the subscriptions made by those present on the Sunday preceding were ratified. The list was completed, and at another meeting at the church Monday night the list of subscribers containing the above caption was presented, in a speech by Prof. Rives, Sr., on behalf of the citizens, to the church committee, and was by it, then and there, on motion, duly accepted, and the college located at Searcy. Rogers was present at all the meetings, but at none of them did he even suggest or intimate that his subscription was grounded upon the condition, in express terms, that the college was to be located "within the corporate limits of Searcy." Some of the largest subscribers testify that, had he done so, they would not have subscribed. In the light of events which transpired soon after the college had been located at Searcy, we think it doubtless true that Rogers was prompted to his commendable liberality and herculean endeavors in securing the location of the college at Searcy by both the desire and expectation of having the college, when built, placed upon his ground, most of which was within the corporate limits. There was every reason for him to be inspired with such a hope, and to be urged by such a motive; for the tract of land which he owned at that time in Searcy was regarded, by many as well as Rogers, as by far the most suitable site to be had for the college location. Indeed, at that time it was almost the consensus of opinion that the Rogers tract was the most eligible, and the committee to select the grounds for the college building and campus agreed to select this tract, and would have done so, but for the fact that insuperable barriers, as they supposed, stood in the way of their securing title to another small tract (Shinpocho) adjoining, which was regarded by the committee as necessary for the college campus; and, of course, the necessary grounds for the campus, as well as for the building, had to be considered in selecting the situs for the college. Although Rogers doubtless had in his mind the final location of the college on his own ground, we think the fact that he and so many others considered his as the most suitable location, made him willing to take his chances on finally securing it on his ground after the location should be determined upon for Searcy. The paramount consideration with him first was the location of the college at Searcy, without which he could not expect to have the college building located on his land. Another cogent fact showing this is that the tract which he himself preferred was not all within the corporate limits, and the only other tract which anyone considered at all suitable was not all within the corporate limits. We find nothing in the record to justify the conclusion that the parties to the contract used the word "at" in any other sense than usually indicated by the term, denoting a place conceived of as a mere geographical point, just as we would say, speaking of the location of a village, or some institution: "Hendrix College is located at Conway, the University at Fayetteville. We are going to locate a college at Searcy," etc. It is true that "at" is often used to denote inclusive space, and such is the case when it is used, as it frequently is, to lay the venue in criminal cases, it being necessary in those cases to show that the crime was perpetrated within the jurisdiction of the court. Graham v. State, 1 Ark. 171; Blackwell v. State, 30 Tex. App. 416; Augustine v. State, 20 Tex. 450; State v. Nolan, 8 Rob. (La.) 517; Bishop, Forms, § 80; 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 378. See also other cases cited in brief of appellant in which "at" was used in the sense of "in," denoting acts to be performed within definite limits. But should we concede that "at" was used by the parties in the sense of "in,"—which is the most that can be claimed for it under the proof,—still it does not follow that it means "within the corporate limits." In First Nat. Bank v. Wilson, 62 Ark. 143, Judge Riddick said, "There may be towns that have overgrown their corporate limits." Generally, in speaking of a town as a mere place of geographical location, we have no reference whatever to the corporate limits, but simply use the name of the town as designating the aggregate body of people living in such considerable collection of dwelling houses, and in such proximity as to constitute a town, as distinguished from the country. Standard Dict., Town. For instance, if the bishop did say, "We propose to locate a college 'in' Searcy," no one would have been justified in concluding from that language alone that he meant "within the corporate limits of Searcy," as contradistinguished from that part of the town lying beyond the corporate limits. And it is shown that a large number of the inhabitants of the town dwelt beyond the corporate limits. Such a proposition, however, coming from the committee of the church, would bind it to locate the college in the town of Searcy, and not in the country adjacent thereto. In this view of the case, whether or not the college was located in the town or country is a question of fact upon which the finding of the trial court will not be disturbed.

Second. It is contended "that there can be no recovery, because Rogers withdrew his offer to subscribe." As soon as Rogers ascertained that the committee who had been appointed to fix upon the situs for the college would go beyond the corporate limits to look at locations, he notified members of that committee that they had no power to look at locations beyond the corporate limits, and he told Mr. Pipkin, who was a member of the committee of the conferences, that he would not "pay a cent" if the college was located out of town. He notified the building committee to the same effect. It may be said properly that these were the agencies left in charge by the church committee to carry on the work, in the absence of said committee, until the college should be duly organized and incorporated. So the notice that he did not intend to be bound by his subscription was sufficient. But this notice was not given until after the Monday night meeting, when the subscription list was presented to the representatives of the church, and accepted by them, and the location of the college given to Searcy. The contract between Mr. Rogers and the church, as stated, was closed that night. The terms of the contract were that the church, for a valuable consideration moving from the citizens of Searcy, would locate, build, and maintain a college there, and that the subscribers, in consideration of the performance of these stipulations by the church, would pay to it certain amounts. The rule, as announced by the best text-writers and the best adjudications, is that a gratuitous subscription will be considered as only a continuing offer to make a gift, and, until accepted by the promisee, and acted upon in such manner as to raise a consideration, it may be withdrawn. 1 Whart. Contr. 528; Clark, Contr. 167; 1 Parsons, Contr. 451; Anson, Contr. 73, note; 1 Beach, Modern Law of Contracts, § 206; Cottage Street M. E. Church v. Kendall, 121 Mass. 528, 23 Am. Y. 601, 6 L. R. A. 807. See also note of Judge Bennett to Cottage Street M. E. Church v. Kendall, 16 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 546, where cases on Subscription are reviewed. "Any benefit accruing to him who makes the promise, or any loss, trouble, or disadvantage undergone by or charge imposed upon him to whom it is made, is a sufficient consideration to sustain a promise." Ex parte Hodges, 24 Ark. 201; Troy Conference Academy v. Nelson, 24 Vt. 189; Amherst Academy v. Couls, 6 Pick. 427, 17 Am. Dec. 387; Barnes v. Perine, 12 N. Y. 18, 25; Cottage Street M. E. Church v. Kendall, 121 Mass. 528, 23 Am. Rep. 286. As soon as the subscription was accepted the church entered upon the performance of her part of the contract by locating the college at Searcy. This, too, was the most important part of the contract for the church as well as the subscribers, for it deprived the church of entertaining propositions of donations from other places in the state, however liberal and inviting they may have been, and by the act of locating the college the subscribers got all they were then asking. Furthermore, the church immediately constituted agencies, and put them to work to carry out, in good faith, her part of the contract, which these agencies were doing when Rogers concluded that he would not be bound by his subscription. Moreover, this subscription was not an offering to charity, and it was something more than a mere subscription to a public purpose. The presentation of the subscription list, under the circumstances, carried with it the request that the church locate the college at Searcy, and thus deny it to all other places. The granting of this request meant the expenditure of thousands of dollars by the church, and the bestowment upon the subscribers of a real benefit. Philomath College v. Hartless, 6 Or. 158, 25 Am. Rep. 511. In Williams v. Rogan, 59 Tex. 488, the court said: "This is not the ordinary case of a subscription to some charitable or public purpose in which there are no contracting parties except the subscribers; but the subscribers are the parties upon the one side, and the district conference the party upon the other. Upon the acceptance of the proposition of the conference, the subscribers became bound, as did the conference upon its acceptance of the subscription and agreement, to build in accordance with the terms of the subscription. There was, then, a mutuality of engagement, so that each party had the right to hold the other to a binding agreement, and it became so previous to or even without performance." There is ample warrant in the law, under the facts of this case, for holding Rogers to his subscription without going to the extent of the Texas court, though there is a strong line of cases supporting this doctrine. Collier v. Baptist Education Soc. 8 B. Mon. 68; Troy Conference Academy v. Nelson, 24 Vt. 194; Ladies' Collegiate Inst. v. French, 16 Gray, 196 (cases cited); Fryeburg Parsonage Fund v. Ripley, 6 Me. 442; Anson, Contr. p. 94, note, Subscriptions.

Third. Was the subscription of Rogers upon condition that there should be a full subscription of $25,000, and, if so, was the condition fulfilled? Bishop Galloway, speaking presumably for the church committee, required a bonus or subscription of $25,000 as a condition precedent to the location of the college at Searcy. The church, under this proposition, was not bound to locate the college until said amount was subscribed, and upon the authority of Turner v. Baker, 30 Ark. 186, neither were the subscribers (unless for other reasons), for the stipulations of the contract, when entered upon, had to be mutually binding upon the respective parties to constitute a valid consideration. Was the $25,000 subscribed? A subscription list showing that said amount had been subscribed was presented to the committee. True, it contained the names of Wilburn and Greer, who it is said, were not bona fide subscribers of the amounts named for each, and that, even reckoning these, the list lacked $364 of the necessary amount. Greer's subscription was authorized by him; Wilburn's was not. However, the list shows the names of six gentlemen "who gave a written guaranty of balance, $364." When it was ascertained that Wilburn's subscription for $1,- 000 was not authorized by him, the six gentlemen who had guaranteed the balance held themselves bound under the terms of their agreement to make this good, and did so. They were the parties to the agreement "to make up the balance," and must have understood what that meant better than anyone else. In the absence of any showing to the contrary, we think their construction of what they were required to do "to make up the balance" (although $364 was expressly named) should be taken as the true state of the case. Therefore a finding that $25,000 was subscribed would not be clearly against the preponderance of the evidence. But, should we be mistaken in this, still the contention could not avail Rogers, for so long as the doctrine of estoppel in pais retains its potency in a court of conscience one will not be heard to deny the existence of a certain state of facts which he, either in express terms or by conduct, represented as existing, and which he intended to be acted upon by another in a certain way, and which was so acted upon in good faith by the other, to his detriment. Carr v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 10 C. P. 307; Seton v. Lafone, L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 68, 70; Troy Conference Academy v. Nelson, 24 Vt 194; 2 Herman, Estoppel & Res Judicata, §§ 759, 762, 764. "The getting up of the subscription was the business of the citizens." The business of the church committee was to locate the college. In the work of "getting up" and perfecting the subscription list, Rogers took a prominent part. He knew, or should have known (being present), how the alleged subscriptions of Wilburn and Greer were taken; that the former was by the daughters of Wilburn, and the latter through Mr. Pipkin. At the Monday afternoon meeting he made no objection to, and no inquiry concerning, the two subscriptions now called in question. But, on the contrary, so well satisfied was he that the list met the requirements of the committee as to the $25,000, and that it would be accepted, that he joined in a request to the bishop to appoint a committee on the location of the college site, and himself proposed how that committee should be constituted. The church committee, some of whom were present at all the church meetings, could not have failed to observe that Rogers was a leading spirit in the enterprise. When Prof. Rives, representing Rogers and all the subscribers, presented the list as a subscription list for $25,000, the church committee had the right to rely upon this representation. There was nothing to give notice that the subscribers present were not acting in the utmost good faith. Rogers was a resident, knew the subscribers, and knew what the committee demanded. The committee "took the subscribers at their word," so to speak, accepted the list as a subscription for $25,000, and located the college at Searcy, expending thousands of dollars more than the subscription of $25,000 in its erection and equipment. But that Rogers got what he asked would be enough, under the circumstances, to sweep him from any standing in a court of equity on this contention.

Fourth. Is the subscription of Rogers "void because the condition that four persons should subscribe $2,500 each was not complied with?"

It is claimed that G. B. Greer was not a bona fide subscriber for $2,500. Rogers proposed to be one of four to subscribe $2,500 each. This was not a condition imposed by the church, but Rogers had the right to, and did, make it a condition for binding him. Greer authorized Pipkin to enter his name upon the subscription list for $2,500. This was done the 26th day of February, 1888. Pipkin says that he told Greer "that the whole matter was hinging on his [Greer's] decision; that, if he would pay the $2,500, the institution would be located at Searcy, and that Greer said 'he would not let it fail; to go and put him down for $2,500.'" Pipkin further says: "I told him, as a gentleman, that if he would pay the $2,500, and save the institution, that I would do what I could to help him. Nothing was said upon any note or release in any respect from the $2,500," and at that time no amount was mentioned. This is uncontradicted. About one month after this (March 26) Greer executed his note to cover the subscription, and he says "that he did it upon condition that he was to be one of four to make up $10,000, with the understanding that $1,500 was to be collected and paid by Mr. Pipkin and Mr. Jeffett as a credit on his note. They were to canvass the state and get it. He says he was willing to subscribe only $1,000, and that the note was executed for $2,500 in order to bind the other three who had subscribed $2,500 each; that Pipkin signed the note as chairman of the board, and that Yarnell and himself, who were on the board, signed it. Yarnell was away, and he [Greer] signed his [Yarnell's] name, having authority to do so." The paper spoken of by Greer as the "note" is as follows:

Received of G. B. Greer fifteen hundred dollars, to be applied to his subscription to the Galloway Female College for twenty-five hundred dollars when collected [Signed] E. M. Pipkin,

President of Board.
A. W. Yarnell,
G. B. Greer, of Board.

Pipkin says that he never thought of this being considered a release of Greer on his subscription for $2,500; that it was not so intended. Yarnell denied that Greer had any authority to sign his name. It is sufficient to say of this so-called release that the proof does not justify the conclusion that it was designed as a release pro tanto of Greer's subscription. But, if it were so intended, it could not have that effect. Pipkin neither as "president of the board" nor as a private individual had authority to release any of the subscribers from their subscriptions. The authority which the building committee had in the premises, or Pipkin acting for it and the church, was not to release, but to collect, what had been subscribed. Greer's name was, by his authority, put upon the subscription list. Any private understanding he might have had with Pipkin that he (Greer) was not to pay but $1,000, even if such were the fact, could not operate to defeat his subscription, or that of any other subscriber. This so-called release was not taken until a month after Greer's contract with the church had been closed. Pipkin was not representing the church committee when he was soliciting Greer's subscription, nor when Greer instructed him to put his name on the list. Pipkin's commendable energy and enthusiasm may have led him to make promises on his own behalf which he could not carry out. But, if so, for this the church was in no wise responsible. Moreover, Greer's subscription for $2 500 has been fully paid, which speaks for itself as to whether or not Greer considered himself bound by it. Where a specific sum is to be raised, and confidential subscriptions are taken from some, not intended to be collected, in order to induce others to subscribe, such fictitious or honorary subscriptions would be a fraud upon the other subscribers, and the latter would not be liable unless, after deducting the bogus subscriptions, the required sum had been raised. 1 Whart. Contr. 529; 1 Parsons, Contr. 454; Blodgett v. Morrill, 20 Vt. 509; New York Exchange Co. v. De Wolf, 31 N. Y. 273. But the conduct of the church committee was free from fraud and dissimulation throughout the whole transaction.

Again, since this condition was imposed by Rogers, who knew that Greer's subscription was put down by Pipkin, and that it was the last of the four for $2,500, and since Rogers made no inquiries about it, and was a party to the presentation of the list in that form to the church committee, thereby representing that same met the requirements of said committee for the location of the college; and since the offering of that list, under the circumstances, could be construed as nothing less than a request from the subscribers for the location of the college, as the committee granted this request, which could not now be undone without irreparable loss to the church and college, the subscribers must not be heard to complain. The church is not complaining of Greer's subscription, Greer is not complaining, and Rogers' complaint on this score is unavailing.

Fifth. The last contention, "that there can be no recovery upon the original subscription," is not well taken.

1. Even if the original contract had merged in the note as is insisted, still the note would be binding for reasons already shown. But without an original contract of subscription there could be no recovery at all, and this, as stated supra, was entered into between the church and Rogers Monday night, February 27, 1888. Although an offer to subscribe was made by Rogers the day before, it did not become binding until the conditions imposed were fully met by the parties, and the contract closed. Nothing was done, or could have been done, after that, without the assent of both Rogers and the church, to alter the terms of the contract. The agencies representing the church committee had no authority to vary the terms of the contract. They were constituted for the express purpose of enforcing it as made. If, as appellant argues, the oral or original contract merged in the note, and no parol evidence is admissible to vary its terms, what becomes of the conditions that $25,000 was to be subscribed, and that four persons were to subscribe $2,500 each, etc.? The note is as follows: "On consideration of the location, erection, and operation by the Methodist Episcopal Church for the state of Arkansas of the state female college of said church in Searcy Ark., I hereby agree to pay on demand to the building committee to be appointed by said church the sum of $2,500. The only conditions prescribed by this instrument are the 'location, erection, and operation by the Methodist Episcopal Church of the state female college of said church in Searcy, Arkansas.'" That the college has been located, erected, and operated is conceded, and Rogers only complains that it was not located "within the corporate limits of Searcy," and that the other conditions, supra, were not complied with. But none of these being mentioned in the note, if it alone is to be considered as the contract and the basis of the suit, then Rogers' "last estate is worse than his first," for he could only defeat payment of the note by showing that the conditions therein contained had not been complied with. Under this view, necessarily, various other contentions would pass out. The pleadings and proof show that suit was grounded upon the original contract of subscription entered upon at the time mentioned above.

2. The solemn admission of appellant "that the Galloway Female College, as now incorporated, is the institution which was established pursuant to the subscriptions and propositions of Bishop Galloway February 26 and 27, 1888," answers his contention as to the want of proper parties. The college is the beneficiary of that subscription. It stands in loco ecclesie as to the right to sue upon it. Chamblee v. McKenzie, 31 Ark. 155; Talbot v. Wilkins, 31 Ark. 411; Hecht v. Caughron, 4th Ark. 132; Benjamin v. Birmingham, 50 Ark. 433; Sandels & H. Dig. § 5623. See also Johnston v. Ewing Female University, 35 Ill. 518; Snell v. Methodist Episcopal Church Soc. 58 Ill. 290.

3. The reasons designated "A," "B," "C," "D," have been already considered except "C," and that was not raised below, and seems unimportant. Upon a careful consideration of this large record, assisted, as we have been, by learned and exhaustive briefs of counsel, we conclude that there is no equity in the answer to the complaint. The church has faithfully performed her part of the contract. She has planted at the town of Searcy an excellent institution of learning, valued at $60,000, which has been creditably maintained and sustained by the great body of Methodists in the state. Mr. Rogers "forged to the fore" in the movement which secured this college for his town, his conduct doubtless causing many of his fellow citizens to subscribe so liberally towards the enterprise. They, like him, have shared the benefits, but unlike him, they have also borne the burdens. It would have been a praiseworthy expenditure of capital and energy on the part of Mr. Rogers, even though bottomed on the conditions disclosed in his answer. But, unfortunately for him, as to whether or not these conditions existed, and had been complied with, are mainly questions of fact upon which the ruling of the learned chancellor was adverse to him, and the record shows full warrant for his finding. Nor have we discovered any misapprehension of the law applicable to such cases.

The decree is therefore in all things affirmed.

Battle, J., dissenting:

As to the facts in this case, my conclusion is as follows: A proposition was made to the people of Searcy to locate a female college of the Methodist Church of the state of Arkansas at Searcy, if any number of them would subscribe, in the aggregate, the sum of $25,000 for that purpose. On that condition, and the further condition that three other citizens of Searcy would each subscribe a like amount, and thereby make the total amount of the subscriptions of himself and the three others $10,000, Thomas J. Rogers subscribed the sum of $2,500. He thereafter executed the memorandum sued on, by which he agreed to pay this amount, on demand, to the building committee to be appointed by the Methodist Church. Many other citizens of Searcy subscribed liberally for the same purpose, and several nonresidents subscribed, whose subscriptions were added to their list, but, in order to make the subscriptions of all of them (including the nonresidents added to the list) amount to $25,000, or the subscriptions of any four of them amount to $10,000, the amount said to have been subscribed by G. B. Greer, was necessary. He ostensibly subscribed and gave his note for $2,500 but with the secret understanding and agreement that he would contribute only $1,000, it being understood that $1,500 should be collected by subscription from other sources, and credited on his note and subscription. He, however, afterwards agreed to and did pay about $2,500 without the benefit of the credit he was to receive. Before he decided to do so, Rogers declined to pay his subscription unless the college was located within the corporate limits of Searcy, and gave sufficient notice in due time that he would not do so except on the condition named, which was never performed.

According to the facts before stated, Rogers is not bound to pay his subscription. Turner v. Baker, 80 Ark. 186; Stuart v. Second Presby. Church, 84 Pa. 888; 1 Beach, Modern Law of Contracts, § 40; 1 Whart. Contr. § 529; 1 Parsons, Contr. 8th ed. *454.

I think the decree of the chancery court should be reversed, and the complaint dismissed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

Frederick J. GUSTAFSON and Wife

(70 Conn. 125.)

1. The mere naked assertion of the value of property by a vendor to the purchaser during negotiations for a sale, though consciously untrue and relied upon by the purchaser to his hurt, does not, in the absence of special circumstances, constitute an actionable deceit.
2. A purchaser seeking to avoid the general rule that mere representations of value do not constitute actionable deceit must allege the specific facts which bring him within one of the exceptions to the rule.
3. The objection that the facts found show that plaintiffs have no cause of action cannot be raised on appeal under Gen. Stat. § 1185, where the appellant did not make any claim of that kind in the court below, and does not make it in his assignments of error, but merely presents it in his brief.
4. The trial court cannot be convicted of error on appeal in excluding evidence which was not admissible for the purpose for which it was offered, because it was admissible for purposes first suggested in the appellate court.
5. A purchaser who was induced to make the contract by the false and fraudulent representations of the vendor may, acting seasonably, rescind the contract after giving or tendering back what he has received, and recover back the consideration, or he may retain the land and recover damages for the deceit, in a proper action.

NOTE.—For expression of opinion as a fraud, see note to Hedin v. Minneapolis Medical & Surgical Inst. (Minn.) 35 L. R. A. 417.

6. The measure of damages for the fraudulent misrepresentation of a vendor of real property inducing the purchaser to enter into the contract is the difference between the value of the property as it would have been if as represented and its real value, and not necessarily the difference between the purchase price and its real value.

7. Parol evidence is admissible to show fraudulent misrepresentations by the vendor as to the quantity of the land sold, though not in any manner incorporated in the deed consummating the contract.

8. The failure of the court upon a trial without a jury to definitely adopt one of the two measures of damages contended for by the respective parties is not reversible error where the application of either rule leads to substantially the same result.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Hartford County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for fraud in the sale of real estate. Affirmed.

Plaintiffs exchanged a house on Julius street in Hartford for a farm belonging to defendant in Suffield and some lumber. The farm was in three pieces and defendant stated that it contained 186 acres, more or less, when in fact it contained only 96½ acres, he also claimed to include in the trade 10,000 feet of lumber when he owned only 1,000 feet. Prior to the trade plaintiff went upon the land which was in irregular pieces, and defendant pointed out certain monuments as being on the land when in fact they were not so. The calls in the deed were correct. For the injury caused by these false assertions plaintiffs brought this action. Defendant pleaded a general denial, and as a counterclaim set up that plaintiffs represented that the Julius street house was worth $3,000 over and above encumbrances, when in fact it was worth only $1,750.

Further facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. William F. Henney, for appellant:

Misrepresentations of the dimensions of the farm in question by defendant to plaintiff, even though intentional, cannot lay a foundation for an action upon the facts found by the court.

Wamsley v. Currence, 25 W. Va. 548; Crown v. Carriger, 66 Ala. 590; Chrysler v. Canaday, 90 N. Y. 277, 43 Am. Rep. 166; Simar v. Canaday, 53 N. Y. 306, 13 Am. Rep. 523.

All statements by a vendor as to the value of property sold are not mere matter of opinion. If he, knowing them to be untrue, makes them with the intention of misleading the vendee, and if the latter, relying upon them, is misled to his injury, he may avoid the contract or recover damages for the injury.

Simar v. Canaday, 53 N. Y. 298, 13 Am. Rep. 523.

The court erred in excluding the testimony offered to show the comparative value of the Sufferd farm and the Julius street property. The true rule of damages is not the difference in value between what plaintiff got and what he bargained for, but the difference between the value of what he gave and what he received in the trade.

Mr. Joseph L. Barbour, for appellees:

Defendant's claim is based wholly on allegations that the plaintiffs falsely, fraudulently, and knowingly misrepresented the value of certain real estate, and thereby, in effect, induced the defendant to purchase the same. There is no allegation that plaintiffs misrepresented or concealed the amount of encumbrance; the alleged misrepresentation was simply as to the value above encumbrances.

Misrepresentations must be of a fact, not expressions of opinion. Statements as to value are usually expressions of opinion not to be relied on.

Torrance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question to be considered is whether the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the counterclaim. The false representation therein set out and relied upon relates simply to the worth of the Julius street property over and above the encumbrances. It is a mere naked representation of the value of an equity of redemption, and nothing more.

The general rule is that a mere naked assertion of the value without more, made between vendor and vendee during the negotiations for a sale, though untrue, and known to be so by the one who makes it, and relied on by the other, to his hurt, does not constitute an actionable deceit; and this for the reason that such an assertion, in most cases, is, and is understood to be, the statement of an opinion, and not of a fact, and the party to whom it is made has no right to rely upon it, and, if he does so, his loss, if any occurs, is held to be the result of his own folly. 1 Bigelow, Fr. 490; Parker v. Moulton, 114 Mass. 99, 19 Am. Rep. 815; Morse v. Shaw, 124 Mass. 59; Homer v. Perkins, 124 Mass. 431, 27 Am. Rep. 677; Ellis v. Andrews, 56 N. Y. 83, 15 Am. Rep. 879; Chrysler v. Canaday, 90 N. Y. 272; Shanks v. Whitney, 66 Vt. 405. See also cases cited in note to Coltrill v. Krum, in 18 Am. St. Rep. 556, 100 Mo. 397.

There are, undoubtedly, exceptions to this general rule, arising out of the special circumstances under which the representation as to mere value is made,—as, for instance, where the one who makes the representation holds a position of trust or confidence towards the other, which gives the latter a right to rely on the representation, or where the seller has, or assumes to have, special knowledge of the value of the property, and the buyer has no knowledge thereof, and the latter, to the seller's knowledge, trusts entirely to the seller's representation. In such cases the seller may justly be held liable for his false representations, because by them the buyer is fraudulently induced to forbear inquiry as to their truth. A mere false representation as to the value of real estate, knowingly made by the seller to the buyer, is not actionable, unless the buyer has been fraudulently induced to forbear inquiry as to its truth; and in that case the means by which he was thus induced to forbear inquiry must be specifically set forth in the pleading. "To such representations the maxim Caveat emptor applies. The buyer is not excused from an examination unless he be fraudulently induced to forbear inquiries which he would otherwise have made. If fraud of this latter description is relied on as an additional ground of action, it must be specifically set forth in the declaration, and cannot be charged in general terms only." Parker v. Moulton, 114 Mass. 99, 100, 19 Am. Rep. 815; Ellis v. Andrews, 56 N. Y. 83, 15 Am. Rep. 879; Chrysler v. Canaday, 90 N. Y. 272.

Upon the counterclaim, as it stands, the defendant's case falls within the general rule and not within any of the recognized exceptions. If he desired to bring it within any of these exceptions, he should have alleged the specific facts which would bring it within one of them; but this he did not do, and for this reason the demurrer was properly sustained.

In his brief the defendant claims, in substance, that the general principles here applied to the statement of facts in the counterclaim, if applied to the facts found, show that the plaintiffs have no cause of action. He says, "Misrepresentations of the dimensions of the farm in question by the defendant to the plaintiff, even though intentional, cannot lay a foundation for an action, upon the facts found by the court." If the defendant were at liberty to make this claim here, it might be shown in reply that the facts set up in the counterclaim and the facts found differ very materially, and that this difference may be just the difference between a false representation that is actionable and one that is not; but the defendant, under the statute (Gen. Stat. § 1135), is not at liberty to make this claim here, because he did not make any claim of this kind in the court below, nor has he made it in his assignments of error. Under the circumstances of this case, we decline to consider this claim.

The defendant claims that the court excluded the evidence of the value of the Julius street property as compared with the value of the farm, and that it erred in so doing. Although there is some doubt as to whether the court did absolutely and finally rule this evidence out, we will consider the case as if it had so ruled. The defendant claimed that the measure of damages was the difference between the value of the farm and the value of the property given in exchange for it, while the plaintiffs claimed that it was the difference between the value of the property which the defendant owned and conveyed and its value if it had been as represented. From the record, it is clear that this evidence was offered solely as bearing upon the question of damages, and on the assumption that the rule as to the measure of damages was as claimed by the defendant. In his brief the defendant now claims that the evidence was admissible for another purpose, namely, as "tending to show the improbability of his having made the representations complained of." The evidence was undoubtedly admissible for this purpose, and for other purposes, as, for instance, as evidence—but not conclusive—to show, from the price paid, the value of the farm conveyed to the plaintiffs. Bigelow, Fr. pp. 627, 628; 3 Sutherland, Damages, p. 592. But the trouble with this claim is that it was not made in the court below, and cannot be considered now. The question, then, whether the court erred in excluding this evidence, depends on the further question, What is the proper measure of damages in cases of this kind? A vendee, induced to purchase land by false and fraudulent representations, may, acting seasonably, rescind the contract, and, after giving or offering to give back what he received, may recover back the consideration, or he may retain the land, and recover damages for the deceit in a proper action. Ives v. Carter, 24 Conn. 392, 403; Krumm v. Beach, 96 N. Y. 398; Vail v. Reynolds, 118 N. Y. 297; Fryor v. Foster, 130 N. Y. 171. The present case is one where the plaintiffs have elected to keep the land, and seek to recover for the deceit in an action of tort; and the question is, What is the measure of damages in this action? Upon this question the decisions of the courts of last resort are not in harmony. In one class of cases the measure of damages is held to be the difference between the actual value of the property at the time of the purchase and its value if the property had been what it was represented or warranted to be, while in the other class of cases it is held to be the difference between the real value of the property retained by the plaintiff, as it was at the time of the purchase, and the value of that which he gave for it. In the former class of cases the plaintiff is allowed the benefit of his bargain; in the latter, he is not. Morse v. Hutchins, 102 Mass. 489, is an example of the first class of cases, while Smith v. Bolles, 132 U. S. 125, 33 L. ed. 281, is an example of the other class. In Morse v. Hutchins the court says: "It is now well settled that, in actions for deceit or breach of warranty, the measure of damages is the difference between the actual value of the property at the time of the purchase, and its value if the property had been what it was represented or warranted to be."

This is the only rule which will give the purchaser adequate damages for not having the thing which the defendant undertook to sell him. To allow to the plaintiff only the difference between the real value of the property and the price which he was induced to pay for it would be to make any advantage lawfully secured to the innocent purchaser in the original bargain inure to the benefit of the wrongdoer, and, in proportion as the original price was low, would afford a protection to the party who had broken, at the expense of the party who was ready to abide by, the terms of the contract." In Smith v. Bolles, on the other hand, it was said: "The measure of damages was not the difference between the contract price and the reasonable market value if the property had been as represented to be, even if the stock had been worth the price paid for it; nor, if the stock were worthless, could the plaintiff have recovered the value it would have had if the property had been equal to the representations. What the plaintiff might have gained is not the question, but what he had lost by being deceived into the purchase. The suit was not brought for breach of contract. The gist of the action was that the plaintiff was fraudulently induced by the defendant to purchase stock upon the faith of certain false and fraudulent representations."

The defendant was liable to respond in such damages as naturally and proximately resulted from the fraud. He was bound to make good the loss sustained, such as the moneys the plaintiff had paid out, and interest, and any other outlay legitimately attributable to defendant's fraudulent conduct; but this liability did not include the expected fruits of an unrealized speculation." Both of these cases relate to sales of personal property, but no distinction is made, in the application of these rules, between sales of personal and sales of real property. Bigelow, Fr. p. 627; Sedgw. Damages, 2d ed. p. 559; 3 Sutherland, Damages, § 1171. And no good reason has yet been given why there should be any such distinction. Both courts, in the cases above mentioned, recognize the existence of the general rule that the defendant is only liable for such damages as are the natural and proximate result of his fraud, but they differ in applying it. In Morse v. Hutchins the loss of the benefits of his bargain is regarded as one of the elements of plaintiff's damages, resulting naturally and proximately from the fraud, while in Smith v. Bolles such loss is not so regarded. The general rule in 89 L. R. A.

regard to the measure of damages in actions of deception has been stated, and we think correctly, as follows: "The defendant is liable, not for everything that follows upon his fraud, but for what may be presumed to have been within his contemplation at the time, as a man of average intelligence." Bigelow, Fr. p. 625. Applying the general rule (as thus stated to a case like the present, we think the loss of the benefits of the bargain is one of the elements of damages which the defendant must be held to have contemplated as the natural and proximate result of his conduct, and for which he is therefore answerable. In Bigelow, Fr. p. 627, the rule is stated as follows: "It is now well settled that, in actions for deceit or breach of warranty in sales of personalty or realty, the measure of damages is the difference between the actual value of the property at the time of the purchase and its value if the property had been what it was represented or warranted to be," citing numerous cases. This is the rule, also, as stated and favored in 3 Sutherland, Damages, pp. 589, 592. It is the rule adopted and followed in numerous cases relating to the sale of personal property, and it is the rule adopted and followed in the following cases relating to the sale of real estate: Krumm v. Beach, 96 N. Y. 398; Vail v. Reynolds, 118 N. Y. 297, in New York; Drew v. Beall, 62 Ill. 164, 168; Nysewander v. Loeman, 124 Ind. 584; Puge v. Parker, 43 N. H. 363, 80 Am. Dec. 172; Shanks v. Whitney, 66 Vt. 405; Williams v. McFadden, 23 Fla. 143. Moreover, it is the rule adopted and followed by this court in Murray v. Jennings, 42 Conn. 9, 19 Am. Rep. 527. In that case it does not appear to have been much discussed, but its application was directly in question,—was, indeed, the only question in the case,—and it was specifically and deliberately adopted and followed. We see no good reason why it should not be considered as the settled rule in this state. The evidence of the value of the Julius street property, then, having been offered solely for the purpose of showing the amount of the plaintiffs' damages, under the rule laid down in Smith v. Bolles, was inadmissible, and the court committed no error in excluding it for that purpose.

The defendant further claims that the court erred in holding that all his representations as to the number of acres in the farm "were not embraced in the deed itself, and the descriptions contained therein." From the objectionable way in which this matter is stated in the record, by transcript from the stenographer's notes, instead of a brief statement of the point by the court in the ordinary manner, it is a little doubtful just what the precise claim of the defendant was before the lower court upon this point. He seems to claim that, as the false representations were made about a month before the deed was made, they were too remote in time to be admissible; but in his brief he says: "The court erred in refusing to hold that all the representations as to the dimensions of the property were embraced, and must be found, in the descriptive part of the deed itself." He says, in effect, that the representations were made a month before the deed was given; that plaintiffs had ample opportunity during that month to find out whether they were true or false, and that they then accepted a deed repugnant on its face to the representations; and that these facts show that it is "hardly credible that after all these representations the defendant executed and the plaintiffs accepted a deed radically different from their tenor." These facts were entitled to great weight as evidence bearing upon the question whether the plaintiffs relied on such representations, and whether they were made at all; and we must, upon this record, assume that the court gave to them all the weight to which they were entitled; but, in spite of them, the court found against the defendant on this point, as upon a matter of fact, and we cannot review that finding here. We understand the real claim of the defendant upon the point now in question to be that evidence of the oral representations was inadmissible because it tended to contradict or vary or add to the deed in some way; that all such representations prior to the deed were merged and embraced in it, and so could not be proved. This claim is not tenable. The evidence was not offered to contradict, add to, or vary the deed, but to show the fraud as alleged, which could be shown in no other way. It was offered to show the false representations which induced the plaintiffs to enter into this transaction and to accept the deed. Certain monuments were pointed out by the defendant to the plaintiff as marking the bounds of the land as to which they were in treaty, which in fact were situated outside of it. This was done with an intent to deceive, and led her to accept the deed subsequently tendered, without having the property surveyed, or making any further examination as to the number of acres embraced within the boundaries mentioned in the conveyance. Her omission to take such steps was a natural consequence of the fraudulent representations. They had precisely the effect designed by the defendant, and he was properly held responsible for the resulting damage. As was said in Russell v. Tuttle, 2 Root, 22: "This action is not laid upon the writing, but for the fraud, . . . which can be proved no otherwise than by the testimony of witnesses." In Cubot v. Christie, 42 Vt. 121, 1 Am. Rep. 313, a vendor, orally, falsely represented that a farm contained 180 acres, when it contained but 117; and it was held that, although a parol warranty could not be shown as against the deed, fraud in representing the quantity could be shown. In Whitney v. Allaire, 1 N. Y. 205, 308, it is said: "For more than thirty years it had been the settled doctrine of the courts of this state that fraudulent representations in reference to the title of real estate, accompanied with damage, is a good ground of action, and that it is immaterial whether any or what covenants are contained in the deed of conveyance." In Carroll v. Jacks, 43 Ark. 439, a vendee, induced to accept a deed by false and fraudulent representations, sued for damages for the fraud; and it was held that, notwithstanding the deed and its covenants, he could prove the oral representations. A similar ruling was followed in Dano v. Sessions, 65 Vt. 79; Keefe v. Sholl, 181

Pa. 90; Griswold v. Gebbie, 126 Pa. 353.—cases where vendees, after deeds to them, sued for fraud in the sale of real estate. See also the following cases, where fraud was allowed to be shown notwithstanding the fact that the evidence, in one sense, tended to contradict a writing: State, Cummings, v. Cass, 52 N. J. L. 77; Mallory v. Leach, 85 Vt. 156, 82 Am. Dec. 625; Cole v. High, 173 Pa. 590; Feltz v. Walker, 49 Conn. 93-99; Fox v. Tabel, 66 Conn. 397-400. The court below did not err in admitting the evidence in question.

In his last assignment of error, the defendant claims, in effect, that the court failed to adopt and apply any fixed rule as to the measure of damages, and did not assess them "in accordance with the rules of exact justice." The record shows that the parties upon the trial made specific, conflicting claims with respect to the rule of damages; and they were entitled to have the true rule applied, and to know which of the conflicting rules was applied by the court. It was the duty of the court to adopt and apply the rule which the plaintiffs contended for, and it was also its duty to make this known to the parties in some way. The record upon this point is not as clear as it should be. It says: "Adopting either rule, I find from the evidence as to the value of the several properties that the result would be approximately the same." The fact implied in this statement, that the court had heard and considered evidence as to the value of both properties, would seem to indicate the adoption of the rule which the defendant contended for, while there are other things elsewhere in the record which seem to indicate that the court adopted the other rule. The record does not show, either expressly or by clear implication, which of the conflicting rules the court adopted and applied. Perhaps the fair import of the record is that in the process of assessing the damages the court applied both rules, and, finding the results approximately the same, did not decide which of them was the true rule, and exclusively applicable. It was the duty of the court to decide this question, however, and to make its decision manifest in some way to the parties, and this was not done. We think the court erred in this, but if, as is found, the application of either rule leads in this case to substantially the same result, it is difficult to see how the defendant has been harmed by the error, and for this reason we do not advise a new trial on account of it.

There is no error.

The other Judges concur, except Hammersley, J., who dissents.

Hammersley, J., dissenting:

In an action of fraud the plaintiff can recover the amount of his actual damage. The elements of actual damage depend on the circumstances of each case, are widely variant, and can hardly be defined accurately in a general rule. Where a vendor warrants an article sold to be of a certain kind, he makes a special contract to indemnify the vendee for any loss by reason of the article not being of that kind; and so, in case of a breach of the warranty, he is bound, by force of the contract, to put the vendee in the same position he would have occupied if the article had been as warranted. In other words, the damage to the vendee is the loss of the benefit of his contract. In a large class of sales of personal property, a contract of warranty may be established by proof of false representations. In such cases it has been held that, so far as the damage was concerned, it was immaterial whether the form of action was the one provided in case of fraud, or in case of breach of warranty; that in either case a contract was established by the same proof, and in either case the plaintiff was entitled to the benefit of his contract, but entitled to that benefit solely because the contract had in fact been validly proved. And so for this class of cases a special rule was recognized,—that in actions of fraud, where a sale had been induced by false representations, the plaintiff could recover the benefit of his contract. But it is evident that such rule implies an existing contract of indemnity, and cannot apply where such a contract is not proved. It might have been better if in such cases the courts had held the plaintiff to his action of contract when he merely sought to recover for its loss, but it is certain the rule cannot be extended beyond its reason without leading to unfortunate confusion in respect to the features which distinguish contract from tort. I do not understand the majority of the court to question this, but to hold that the present case is within the reason of this special rule. It seems to me, however, that it is not. False representations as to certain classes of personal property may establish a contract of warranty. This is not true as to representations of the dimensions of land sold. A contract of warranty in such case can only be proved by the writing. The present plaintiff could not have recovered the alleged benefit of his contract in an action for a breach of contract. There was no legal contract of indemnity, and he could therefore prove no breach and no damage. There was a fraud which induced an exchange of land and he can recover for the damage resulting from that exchange, but not, as it seems to me, for the loss of the benefit of a contract which he has not made. I think, also, that the error in refusing to assess damages in accordance with a rule adopted by the court is fatal. If we assume that the judge made a separate assessment under each rule, and reached substantially the same result, yet he did not reach the same result, whatever latitude we may give to the word "substantially." The assessment adopted must have followed one or the other rule (for the judgment is clearly illegal, if he followed neither); and if his judgment, following the wrong rule, is a single dollar larger than it would have been, following the right rule, it involves the violation of a legal right. To sustain the judgment on the ground that no practical injury was done, the assessment under each rule must have been validly made; but the assessment under the rule claimed by the defendant was made, if not without evidence, yet in the absence of material evidence which the defendant was not permitted to introduce. I think there is error, and that a new trial should be granted.

It is confined to the consideration of the extent of municipal power over the different matters passed upon as public nuisances, and to their regulation, prevention, or abatement as such.

Cases wherein a municipality has in general sought relief in equity against the obstruction or encroachment upon the streets of a public highway as a nuisance will be found specifically treated of in a later note.

I. In general.

It may be stated that as a general rule municipalities have power to maintain such actions as may be appropriate to prevent and abate nuisances destructive of the highways or rendering them useless. Stearns County v. St. Cloud, M. & A. R. Co. 36 Minn. 425; Hooksett v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 44 N. H. 105; Troy v. Cheshire R. Co. 23 N. H. 88, 55 Am. Dec. 177; Springfield v. Connecticut River R. Co. 4 Cush. 63; Easton & A. R. Co. v. Greenwich Twp. 25 N. J. Eq. 565; Rio Grande R. Co. v. Brownsville, 45 Tex. 88; Philadelphia v. Thirteenth and Fifteenth Streets Pass. R. Co. 8 Phila. 648.

Public authorities may proceed in a summary manner to remove nuisances upon the public streets and highways when they are nuisances per se. Bower v. Watertown, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 116; New Castle v. Raney, 130 Pa. 545, 6 L. R. A. 737; Easton, S. E. & W. E. Pass. R. Co. v. Easton, 138 Pa. 505.

In Howley v. Harrall, 19 Conn. 142, 153, it is stated that it is the duty, and at the risk, of the city to see that its streets are clear of nuisances and obstructions; and if a street is legally established and opened, then the court of common council have full authority over it.

The public are entitled to the use of a street as it is originally made, and whoever, without special authority, obstructs it or renders its use hazardous by doing anything upon, above, or below the surface, is guilty of a nuisance. Stephani v. Brown, 40 Ill. 428, 432.

A turnpike road is a public highway established by public authority for public use, and the same proceedings lie for the abatement of a nuisance thereon as in the case of any other common highway. Com. v. Wilkinson, 16 Pick. 175, 26 Am. Dec. 654.

The primary use of a highway is for the purpose of permitting the passing and repassing of the public, who are entitled to the unobstructed and uninterrupted entire width of the highway for that purpose, under temporary exceptions as to deposits for building purposes, and to load and unload wagons, and to receive and take away property for or in the interest of the owner of the adjacent premises. Cohen v. New York, 113 N. Y. 532, 535, 4 L. R. A. 408, Reversing 43 Hun, 345.

So, a city has the right to the whole width of the streets, and is charged with the duty of keeping

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Washington County enjoining them from enforcing an ordinance relating to the catching and killing of dogs. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

the same in good repair and reasonable condition. It has also the right to remove rock or other material found upon any parts of such streets and placed there without its authority, but it cannot use such material in abating such obstructions as a nuisance, especially where it is not shown that the owner has abandoned it, and if it does so use it, it cannot recover the costs of repair from the owner. Kemper v. Burlington, 81 Iowa, 364.

In Vandyke v. Cincinnati, 1 Disney (Ohio) 532, 539, it is said that the character of the nuisance to be removed from a highway must be such as would ordinarily require the interference of the public authorities for its removal, and not such as is merely transient in character, and will of itself in the nature of things soon disappear. In this case the action was brought to recover damages for an obstruction to the sidewalk in a street occasioned by ice and sleet.

The liability of a town to pay damages in case a person is injured by the obstruction of a highway is a sufficient interest in such way to enable it to appear as plaintiff in a complaint in equity to prevent the threatened obstruction. Burlington v. Schwarzman, 52 Conn. 181, 182, 52 Am. Rep. 571; New Haven v. Sargent, 38 Conn. 50, 9 Am. Rep. 390; Derby v. Ailing, 40 Conn. 410; Watertown v. Cowen, 4 Paige, 510, 27 Am. Dec. 80; London v. Bolt, 5 Ves. Jr. 129.

In Centerville v. Woods, 57 Ind. 192, the city authorities were allowed to recover damages they had been compelled to pay, and also the costs of the repairs they were put to through the defendant's negligence in maintaining a ditch or sewer across a public highway left in a dangerous and unsafe condition, and constituting a nuisance and an obstruction to travel.

There are many things which the courts, without proof, declare nuisances, such as the digging of a pit or the erection of a house or other obstruction in a public highway; and an ordinance passed by the town or city, having a general power over the subject, declaring such obstructions nuisances, is valid on its face, and a conviction may properly be had under it without any intrinsic proof to show the act complained of to be in fact a nuisance; and in such a case it is sufficient to show the existence of the act constituting the nuisance. North Chicago City R. Co. v. Lake View, 105 Ill. 207, 212, 218, 44 Am. Rep. 783.

Where the plaintiff sought to recover actual possession of land formerly a public highway in the city, which had been long used by the public as such, and had been uninterruptedly enjoyed by it, the court stated that the fruits of such action would subject the plaintiff to an indictment for a nuisance, the private right being directly hostile to the easement. Cincinnati v. White, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 431, 438, 8 L. ed. 452, 456; Jarvis v. Dean, 3 Bing. 447.

So, if a person unlawfully, injuriously, and with full knowledge of the facts exposes in a public highway a person infected with a contagious disorder such as smallpox, it is a common nuisance to all. King v. Vantandillo, 4 Maule & S. 73, 76.

As a general rule it may be stated that whatever interferes unreasonably and unnecessarily with the public use of the streets is a nuisance which a

Regulations of the most stringent character, and the most summary proceedings for the destruction of these animals kept contrary to such regulations, are entirely within legislative power, and free from constitutional objection, though the property of the owner is destroyed without notice or hearing in the execution of the law.

city council may prohibit by ordinance. White v. Kent, 11 Ohio St. 550, 553.

So, it has been said that whatever menaces or puts in jeopardy citizens passing along the public highway is a public nuisance. Bond v. Smith, 44 Hun, 219, 222; Cain v. Syracuse, 95 N. Y. 83.

And anything which endangers the life of a person passing along the sidewalk is a nuisance which the city council may abate. Parker v. Macon, 39 Ga. 725, 729.

A person traveling upon a highway must do so in such a manner as not unnecessarily or unreasonably to interfere with the exercise of the same right by others, and if he does not exercise this right in a reasonable manner, he is guilty of a nuisance. Turner v. Holtzman, 54 Md. 148, 30 Am. Rep. 361; Rex v. Cross, 3 Campb. 230; Rex v. Jones, 3 Campb. 230; People v. Cunningham, 1 Denio, 524, 43 Am. Dec. 709.

A public officer, such as the superintendent of the streets, has power to remove all nuisances from the same, and an authority or license granted by the mayor is of no avail as against such power. Day v. Green, 4 Cush. 433.

Where the nuisance sought to be abated is the use of the highway, and not a case of a permanent obstruction of the same, the question is one of inconvenience to the public, and unless such inconvenience is really the consequence of the act, there is no nuisance. State v. Edens, 85 N. C. 522, 526.

This is so for the reason that it is not a nuisance for anyone to use the public highway in such a manner as it has been ordinarily used, although much depends upon locality, the width of the highway, and the time it may be obstructed by the alleged nuisance, and therefore what would be a reasonably free passage for the public, and what would be a reasonably safe and convenient road for the accommodation of the public travel in a remote, sparsely populated rural district, might and generally would not be so in a compact city or a large and populous village. In a village or city what would be an obstruction in a broad street little frequented might be very objectionable, if not an absolute nuisance, in a narrow business thoroughfare. Graves v. Shattuck, 35 N. H. 257, 264, 69 Am. Dec. 536.

It is a public nuisance for a timber merchant to cut logs of timber in the streets adjoining his premises, even though he may not be able otherwise to get them into his premises or to carry on his business. Rex v. Jones, 3 Campb. 230.

In Kittle v. Fremont, 1 Neb. 337, it is said that the closing up of public streets or alleys, and the vacation of a public park, are in the nature of a public nuisance, and if done without lawful authority are remediable by a public prosecution instituted by the proper public officer on behalf of the people.

So, a drain and sewer pipe discharging sewage from private premises upon a public street is a nuisance abatable by the town authorities under the provisions of an ordinance for the abatement of nuisances, especially after notice has been given to the owner to abate the same, and the adjudication of the board of health is prima facie evidence of its existence. Kirkwood v. Cairns, 44 Mo. App. 88.

And the lack of a public sewer is no defense for 39 L. R. A.

Rep. 529; Blair v. Forehand, 100 Mass. 136, 1 Am. Rep. 94, 97 Am. Dec. 82; Tower v. Tower, 18 Pick. 262; Carter v. Dow, 16 Wis. 299; Bishop v. Fahay, 15 Gray, 61; Kerr v. Seaver, 11 Allen, 151; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 755.

In Morey v. Brown, 42 N. H. 873, the court, replying to the argument that the act conflicted with the Constitution in that it was a taking of private property for public use, or maintaining a nuisance, at least where it does not appear that the proprietor of the premises either has or can devise any other reasonable means of disposing of his sewage. Kirkwood v. Cairns, 44 Mo. App. 88.

Under the English highway act (5 & 6 Wm. IV. chap. 50, § 73), which provides that if any timber is laid upon a highway so as to be a nuisance, and is not removed after notice, the surveyor of highways, by the order of a justice, may remove the same, it was held, in an action against the magistrate, that the owner of the timber could not give evidence in contradiction of the order, to the effect that the locus in quo was not a highway. Mould v. Williams, 5 Q. B. 469, Davidson & M. 631.

A borough, as the instrumentality by which the governmental duty of constructing and maintaining highways is performed, as the guardian for the public of the highways dedicated to or purchased for its use, is entitled to an injunction against a private corporation which imposes a permanent structure upon the highways of such borough without legislative or municipal permission, for the sole reason that it is an unauthorized exclusion of the public from such portion of the way, regardless of the question as to the greater or less degree of inconvenience or danger or expense thence resulting to the public. Stamford v. Stamford Horse R. Co., 56 Conn. 381, 395, 1 L. R. A. 375.

Where the managing county board is charged with the duty of general supervision of county roads, with power to appropriate county funds for opening, vacating, or resurveying, or otherwise improving, the same, there shall be implied the corresponding power to maintain actions to prevent or abate a public nuisance destructive of the highway or rendering it useless. Stearns County v. St. Cloud, M. & A. R. Co., 36 Minn. 425, wherein it was sought to enjoin the railroad company from creating a public nuisance. To the same effect are the following cases: Hooksett v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co., 44 N. H. 105; Troy v. Cheshire R. Co., 23 N. H. 83, 55 Am. Dec. 177; Springfield v. Connecticut River R. Co., 4 Cush. 67; Easton & A. R. Co. v. Greenwich Twp., 25 N. J. Eq. 565; Rio Grande R. Co. v. Brownsville, 45 Tex. 88; Philadelphia v. Thirteenth & Fifteenth Streets Pass. R. Co., 8 Phila. 648.

A town or city charter usually gives it power to open streets, etc., and to take control and the custody thereof, as well as of the public buildings and public grounds, and therefore it is the duty of the authorities to remove nuisances, and to prevent all obstructions in its public thoroughfares calculated to endanger the lives of those who are upon them. James v. Harrodsburg, 85 Ky. 191, 196.

And the supervisors of a town have power to cause the summary abatement and removal of any public nuisance found in any highway under their jurisdiction. Hubbell v. Goodrich, 37 Wis. 84, 86; Neff v. Paddock, 26 Wis. 546.

So, a city has a right to erect a rail or fence along a highway or street in order to prevent persons falling into a dangerous declivity, even though in so doing it may obstruct the entrance to a passageway of an abutting owner, as no one has a right to an open access to his land adjoining a street of such a character as to endanger persons lawfully using the street. Alger v. Lowell, 3 Allen, 402.

Yet an excavation made with the permission of public authorities does not constitute a nuisance per se, and therefore the persons making such excavation would be engaged in a lawful work, and could only become liable to the city for damages occasioned by means of such excavation upon their neglect to properly guard and protect it so as to prevent injury, the ground of liability in such cases being negligence; and the exercise of proper care would be a sufficient answer. McNaughton v. Elkhart, 85 Ind. 384, 387.

Under the Connecticut statute an excavation so near to a highway as to endanger the passage of travelers, and unguarded, is a public nuisance, whether it adjoins the highway or not, as it endangers passengers in such way, and it is the duty of the public to provide for travelers adequate security against such danger by the erection of a fence or railing between the excavation and the way, thereby in effect abating such nuisance. Norwich v. Breed, 30 Conn. 535, 549.

In Norwich v. Breed, 30 Conn. 535, 549, the court looked upon an unfenced excavation, made by the defendant upon his land adjoining a highway, as a public nuisance, and gave the city judgment for the amount it had been compelled to pay for damages occasioned to one using such highway.

As to excavations in sidewalks, see infra, IV. g.

As a city council has general control of the streets under the charter, it is a part of its duty to prevent the creation of any public nuisance within them. Everett v. Marquette, 53 Mich. 450, 451.

In Hamilton v. Fond du Lac, 40 Wis. 47, 51, it is said that the city council has always been clothed with power to abate public nuisances within the city, and therefore an ordinance of the city council declaring a certain branch of a river a public nuisance, and making provision for the abatement of the same, by means of a new channel, is within the power of the city authorities to enact.

A town is the representative of the state in all matters pertaining to highways, and it has power to abate a nuisance, and in a proper case may resort to equity. Hutchinson Twp. v. Filke, 44 Minn. 538.

Prima facie, a person who appropriates any part of a public street or harbor to his own use exclusively, without the consent of the legislature or the municipal authorities, is guilty of a nuisance which may be abated by such authorities. Hart v. Albany, 3 Paige, 213.

A party, such as the mayor of a city, whose duty it is to prevent obstructions in a river, will be considered a party aggrieved, and may by his own act, without proceeding by way of indictment, abate or remove such nuisance. Hart v. Albany, 9 Wend. 571, 24 Am. Dec. 165.

Where a city charter confers upon the mayor and council full power and authority to keep the streets, lanes, alleys, sidewalks, and public squares of the city in good order, and to remove any buildings, posts, steps, fences, or other obstructions or nuisances, which power is for the public good, it is their duty to exercise it, and to keep such streets and other places in such condition that persons passing along or over the same may do so with safety and convenience, and therefore it is the duty of the city authorities to remove any nuisance from such streets. Parker v. Macon, 39 Ga. 725, 729.

Municipal corporations are the proper representatives of the equitable rights of the inhabitants of a village to the use of a public square so as to authorize the filing of a bill by the corporation in a court of equity to protect those equitable interests against the erection of a nuisance. Watertown v. Cowen, 4 Paige, 510, 27 Am. Dec. 80, 82.

In Lanfear v. New Orleans, 4 La. 97, 23 Am. Dec. 477, an ordinance of the city of New Orleans authorizing the sale, under the order of the mayor, of all property which was suffered to remain on the levee for a longer period than the police regulation of the city permitted, was held not to be within the powers conferred upon the corporation, and was not therefore constitutional, the power to abate nuisances arising from necessity and ceasing with that necessity, the corporation having the power to remove encumbrances as a nuisance at the expense of the proprietor.

In Atty. Gen., Nepean Twp., v. Bytown & N. Road Co. 2 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 626, it was held that a municipality had the right of prohibiting the proceeding with any road within the limits of their jurisdiction, and the making or improving thereof, by a road company formed under the statute 12 Vict. chap. 84, which was commenced before any opposition was made thereto, but without the permission of such municipality. Notice of such opposition, if duly given before the work was commenced, according to the 2d section of that statute, had the effect of an interim injunction to restrain the commencement of the road; but though such notice is not given in time for that purpose, the power of prohibition conferred upon the municipal council is not defeated. In this case it was contended that the interruption of the highway was illegal, and a public nuisance.

If a special power is given by the legislature, and a general power should also exist, the special power controls and limits the general power, and the latter does not extend the former.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 150.

Yet it is a legal solecism to call that a public nuisance which is maintained by public authority. Harris v. Thompson, 9 Barb. 360; Randle v. Pacific R. Co. 65 Mo. 325.

A structure authorized by the legislature cannot be a public nuisance, as a public nuisance must be occasioned by acts done in violation of law, and a work authorized by law cannot be a nuisance. Danville, H. & W. R. Co. v. Com. 73 Pa. 29, 38; Fletcher v. Auburn & S. R. Co. 25 Wend. 468; Drake v. Hudson River R. Co. 7 Barb. 508; Harris v. Thompson, 9 Barb. 350; *King v. Necessity may justify actions which would otherwise be nuisances, and such necessity need not be absolute; it is sufficient if it be reasonable, and therefore a man may be justified in throwing wood, coal, or fuel into the street for the purpose of having it conveyed to his house, and it may lay there a reasonable time. And the rule is the same with respect to building materials, provided they be deposited in the most convenient manner; and so with respect to the goods of a merchant placed in a street for the purpose of being moved to his store, although he will have no right to keep them in the street for the purposes of sale. Wood v. Mears, 12 Ind. 515, 520, 74 Am. Dec. 222; Com. v. Passmore, 1 Serg. & R. 219; People v. Cunningham, 1 Denio, 524, 43 Am. Dec. 709; Cohen v. New York, 118 N. Y. 532, 535, 4 L. R. II. Removal of garbage, etc.

Highways, whether on land or water, cannot be made the receptacles of waste materials, filth, or trash, nor the depositories of valuable property even, so as to obstruct their use as public highways; and all such obstructions are in the eye of the law deemed unreasonable. Gerrish v. Brown, 51 Me. 256, 262, 81 Am. Dec. 569.

An ordinance prohibiting the throwing into or depositing upon any public street or highway of any glass, broken ware, dirt, rubbish, garbage, or filth was upheld in Ex parte Casinello, 62 Cal. 533, as dirt, rubbish, garbage, and filth were in their nature nuisances, glass and broken ware being also easily converted into nuisances,—especially if thrown about promiscuously.

A city by-law prohibiting the removal of house dirt and offal by unlicensed persons will be upheld upon the ground that if everyone was engaged in such a business there would be a continual moving nuisance in the city breaking up the streets by their weight, and poisoning the air with their effluvia; and such by-law is also binding upon strangers within the city limits. Vandine, Petitioner, 6 Pick. 187, 17 Am. Dec. 361.

Yet a city ordinance prescribing duties and regulations for city scavengers, and providing for the restriction of the business to two persons selected 39 L. R. A.

by the mayor, has been declared void upon the ground that it created a monopoly by prohibiting a lawful calling, and for the reason that a town cannot deny to citizens the use of its streets to cross the town on any business that is inoffensive, and cannot by merely declaring an act to be a nuisance make it such. Re Lowe, 54 Kan. 757, 27 L. R. A. 545.

A board of health has no power to declare the removing of garbage, by one to whom it has not granted a permit, to be a nuisance, where the person so removing it adopts the precise means for the purpose prescribed by the city ordinance, under a statute giving such board discretionary power to declare the keeping of garbage and refuse matter on the streets, alleys, and premises of individuals a nuisance. Philadelphia v. Lyster, 3 Super. Ct. (Pa.) 475.

So, such board of health cannot declare the collecting of garbage and offal without a permit from such board to be a nuisance. Philadelphia v. Lyster, 3 Super. Ct. (Pa.) 475.

III. Obstructions of and encroachments on streets.

a. In general.

Upon this section of the subject it may be stated that there are numerous cases upholding the right of municipal corporations to restrain and abate obstructions upon the public streets and highways within the town limits as being within the corporate powers, where such obstructions have not been specifically declared to be nuisances thereby, and the power has been exercised under the general welfare clause for the public safety and in exercise of the general police power. The cases constituting this class are not included in this section of the note which is intended to present, and to be confined to, the subject of municipal control over such obstruction strictly as nuisances, and the restraining and abatement of them as such.

Where the general assembly of a state has vested in cities, villages, and towns the right to control the use of highways, streets, and public grounds within their respective limits, they are invested with the authority of the Crown and of the state to file bills to prevent and remove obstructions from the streets, highways, and public grounds under their control. Metropolitan City R. Co. v. Chicago, 98 Ill. 620, 628; Watertown v. Cowen, 4 Paige, 510, 27 Am. Dec. 80; Jacksonville v. Jacksonville R. Co. 67 Ill. 540.

The general rule of law as shown by the authorities upon the subject is, that any obstruction of the public enjoyment in the use of streets and public thoroughfares is an indictable nuisance which, when a municipality is, by its charter or constituent act, given the control and supervision of the streets, may be abated and restrained by such authorities in their corporate name in any judicial proceeding instituted by them for that purpose. This principle

The power to "license and tax" does not confer the power to destroy.

Baltimore v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217, 38 Am. Rep. 239; State v. Mott, 61 Md. 303, 48 Am. Rep. 105; Hooper v. Creager, 84 Md. 195, 35 L. R. A. 202.

The municipality of Hagerstown has no power to define a nuisance, and designate any set condition of affairs as a nuisance.

is supported by the following authorities: Yates v. Warrenton, 84 Va. 337, 339; People v. Vanderbilt, 28 N. Y. 287; State v. Mobile, 5 Port. (Ala.) 279, 30 Am. Dec. 564; Pittsburgh v. Scott, 1 Pa. 309; Mankato v. Willard, 13 Minn. 13, 97 Am. Dec. 208; Dummer v. Den, Jersey City, 20 N. J. L. 86, 40 Am. Dec. 213.

A city has the same right to maintain an action to prevent the unlawful obstruction of a street as the people of the state have. People, Bryant, v. Holladay, 33 Cal. 241, 249.

As it is the duty of the city to keep its streets in good repair and condition, and as in default thereof it is held responsible in damages for any injury suffered, it should have power to keep the streets clear and free from obstructions, and be permitted to use the appropriate remedies to that end. Metropolitan City R. Co. v. Chicago, 96 Ill. 620, 627.

In Mechling v. Kittanning Bridge Co. 1 Grant, Cas. 416, 419, it is said that for a nuisance that is merely a public wrong only a public action can be brought, and that must be done by the proper public functionaries. In that case the action was brought by a private individual to recover for a public nuisance, but no special damage being shown it was dismissed.

In Van Wyck v. Lent, 33 Hun, 301, 303, it is said, highways of the state are made for, and devoted to, public travel, and the whole public have a right to their use in their entirety, and, when obstructions to public travel are found within their bounds, the commissioners of highways are clothed with power to remove them without waiting for the slow process of law, even though travel be not absolutely and entirely prevented.

So, highways, whether on land or water, are designed for the accommodation of the public for travel or transportation, and any unauthorized or unreasonable obstruction thereon is a public nuisance in law. Gerrish v. Brown, 51 Me. 256, 282, 81 Am. Dec. 569.

The primary purpose of a street is for passage and travel, and any unauthorized and illegal construction of its free use comes within the legal notion of a nuisance. Simon v. Atlanta, 67 Ga. 618, 622, 44 Am. Rep. 739.

Whoever, without special authority, materially obstructs a highway or renders its use hazardous by doing anything upon, above or below the surface, is guilty of a public nuisance. Babbage v. Powers, 130 N. Y. 261, 285, 14 L. R. A. 308.

An obstruction is anything set in the way, whether it totally closes the passage, or only hinders progress, and it is the duty of the municipal corporation, charged with the care of the streets in different towns, to see that they are not unlawfully obstructed either by itself or by others. Atty. Gen. v. Lombard & S. Street Pass. R. Co. 1 W. N. C. 489.

An obstruction is an obstacle, an impediment, a hindrance, that which impedes progress. Patterson v. Vail, 43 Iowa, 142, 145.

And any obstruction or encroachment upon a public street or highway is a public nuisance. Columbus v. Jaques, 30 Ga. 506, 512; State v. Carpenter, 68 Wis. 135, 173, 60 Am. Rep. 848; State v. Teaver, 62 Wis. 362.

So, any obstruction of a street, or encroachment thereon which interferes with its use for the purposes of public travel and transportation, is a public

There exists no evidence that a dog, since the earliest glimmerings of human history, the companion and friend of man, is per se and intrinsically and inevitably a nuisance, as contemplated in *Boehm v. lic nuisance, although there may be interruptions and obstructions of the public streets which may be justified by necessity. Callanan v. Gilman, 107 N. Y. 390, 395.

To obstruct a highway it is not necessary that it should be impassable. Patterson v. Vail, 43 Iowa, 142, 145.

And this is so for the reason that any erection or obstruction placed in any part of a public road or street which deprives the public of the use of any part thereof is a nuisance. People v. St. Louis, 10 Ill. 351, 371, 48 Am. Dec. 359.

Unauthorized erections or obstructions in the public streets or squares of a city are public nuisances. Webb v. Demopolis, 95 Ala. 116, 135, 21 L. R. A. 62.

And the law regards an unauthorized obstruction of a highway as a nuisance per se. Davis v. New York, 14 N. Y. 506, 529, 67 Am. Dec. 186.

So, an unauthorized and illegal obstruction of the public ways of a town or city is a public nuisance. State v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 86 Ind. 114, 116.

And an unauthorized encroachment on, or an illegal appropriation of, a public highway, is a nuisance per se, and may be regarded as a purpresture which is both general and special; general because it is an attack upon that in which everyone has an interest, and special, as to citizens who sustain injury or inconvenience greater than the community at large suffer. Philadelphia v. Thirteenth & Fifteenth Streets Pass. R. Co. 8 Phila. 648.

An obstruction of the highway is an offense at common law and a nuisance, and the Pennsylvania act of April, 1802, does not extinguish such offense, but inflicts an additional penalty for a distinct offense, namely, the nonremoval of the nuisance after notice from the supervisors. Kelly v. Com. 11 Serg. & R. 345, 346.

Such an obstruction or nuisance is an injury to the public. Atty. Gen., Stickle, v. Morris & E. R. Co. 19 N. J. Eq. 396, 392.

And any permanent obstruction of the highway is a public nuisance per se. State v. Berdetta, 73 Ind. 185, 193, 38 Am. Rep. 117.

So, a permanent or habitual obstruction of a street without authority of law is a nuisance. Ely v. Campbell, 59 How. Pr. 333, 335.

And anything which permanently obstructs the use of a street amounts to a public nuisance, unless the same be placed there by operation of law or authority of the public officers. Savannah, A. & G. R. Co. v. Shiels, 33 Ga. 601.

So, even a temporary obstruction of the highway may become a nuisance. State v. Berdetta, 73 Ind. 185, 193, 38 Am. Rep. 117.

Any erection or obstruction placed without authority in any part of a public road or street, which deprives the public of the use of any part thereof, is a nuisance. Metropolitan City R. Co. v. Chicago, 96 Ill. 620, 626; People v. St. Louis, 10 Ill. 351, 48 Am. Dec. 359.

And any unreasonable obstruction of a highway is a public nuisance, yet it is not every obstruction in a highway that constitutes a nuisance per se. Allegheny v. Zimmerman, 95 Pa. 287, 293, 40 Am. Rep. 649.

The obstruction of a highway in any form is prima facie a public nuisance, punishable by the

It is of no consequence that a permanent structure or private enjoyment in a street or highway is confined to a part little used or not used at all; it becomes a nuisance as an encroachment upon the public right. Laing v. Americus, 86 Ga. 756, 757; State v. Berdette, 73 Ind. 185, 38 Am. Rep. 117; Wilbur v. Tobey, 16 Pick. 177; Emerson v. Babcock, 66 Iowa, 257.

A street can no more be obstructed partially than closed altogether. Com. v. Moorehead, 118 Pa. 344, 354.

Any permanent or habitual obstruction in a public street or highway is an indictable nuisance, even though room is left for carriages to pass, and it is not less so though the thing which constitutes the obstruction is not fixed to the ground, but is capable of being, and actually is, removed from place to place in the street. Davis v. New York, 14 N. Y. 506, 524, 67 Am. Dec. 186.

So, any obstruction placed in a public highway without right is a nuisance, and courts will not inquire whether the advantage arising from the act complained of would compensate for all the injury and inconvenience which the public would suffer from it. People v. Vanderbilt, 38 Barb. 288, 293.

When a private person or corporation constructs a ditch or canal across a public highway, such act gives him no right to destroy the way as a throughfare, but he is bound, both by common law and by the statutes of Idaho, to restore or unite the highway at his own expense by some reasonable, safe, and convenient means of passage, and to keep the same in good repair, and the obligation is the same whether the canal or ditch cuts the highway or street within or without the limits of a city or village; and the city authorities may therefore proceed for the abatement of such canal as a nuisance where it obstructs or interferes with the public rights on the highway. Lewiston v. Booth (Idaho) 34 Pac. 800.

And every unauthorized obstruction of a highway to the nuisance of the King's subjects is a public nuisance. Rex v. Cross, 3 Campb. 226.

Again, any unreasonable obstruction of a highway is a public nuisance; yet it is not every obstruction in a highway that constitutes a nuisance per se. Allegheny v. Zimmerman, 95 Pa. 287, 293, 40 Am. Rep. 649.

So, the placing or maintaining a building, stones, or other obstruction in a public highway without lawful authority is a nuisance at common law. Com. v. Blaisdell, 107 Mass. 234; Com. v. King, 13 Met. 115; Stoughton v. Porter, 13 Allen, 191; Hyde v. Middlesex County, 2 Gray, 287.

The unlawful obstruction of the free passage or use of a public street in the customary manner is, under the provisions of §§ 8479, 8480, of the California Civil Code, a public nuisance. San Francisco v. Buckman, 111 Cal. 25, 31.

Where the particular charge is the obstruction of a highway, the question of nuisance or no nuisance depends upon the fact whether its passage is rendered "less commodious," and if it is so rendered the obstruction therein placed constitutes a nuisance abatable by the public authorities. State v. Mobile, 5 Port. (Ala.) 279, 30 Am. Dec. 564.

It has been a favorite exercise of the police power of the state to impose a license upon dogs, to operate as a check upon the keeping of these animals.

Any obstruction of a public road or highway which renders its passage less commodious is a nuisance. Hoole v. Atty. Gen. 22 Ala. 190, 194.

A permanent obstruction erected upon a highway without lawful authority, which renders the highway less commodious than before to the public, is an unlawful act, and a public nuisance at common law. Reg. v. United Kingdom Electric Teleg. Co. 31 L. J. M. C. N. S. 167, 2 Best & S. 447, note.

The question as to whether or not an obstruction or encroachment upon a highway constitutes a nuisance is to be determined by the jury in every case, although every encroachment is not necessarily a nuisance, but if it renders the highway less commodious it is a nuisance. State v. Merrit, 35 Conn. 314, 318; Burnham v. Hotchkiss, 14 Conn. 311.

So, if the obstruction tends to annoy those living near the highway, or to render the passage of the same more difficult, thus incurring the danger of injury, it constitutes a nuisance restrainable by the public authorities. State v. Mobile, 5 Port. (Ala.) 279, 30 Am. Dec. 564.

An opening in a much-frequented street which is dangerous in its character is properly charged as a public nuisance. Beatty v. Gilmore, 16 Pa. 463, 469, 55 Am. Dec. 514.

If the obstruction be permanently, or even habitually, in the highway, it is a nuisance which must be restrained by the authorities. Cohen v. New York, 112 N. Y. 532, 535, 4 L. R. A. 406, Reversing 43 Hun, 345.

The following cases are the same in effect: People v. Cunningham, 1 Denio, 524; Davis v. New York, 14 N. Y. 506, 524, 67 Am. Dec. 186; Callanan v. Gilman, 107 N. Y. 360; Rex v. Jones, 3 Campb. 230; Rex v. Cross, 3 Campb. 224; King v. Russell, 6 East, 427; Clifford v. Dam, 81 N. Y. 52.

So, a mere encroachment upon some portion of the highway limits may, by being placed in the traveled path, as effectually obstruct the passage of carriages as if it extends across the whole highway, and thus become a nuisance abatable by the authorities. State v. Merrit, 35 Conn. 314; State v. Knapp, 6 Conn. 415, 16 Am. Dec. 68.

Yet the question of an obstruction or nuisance upon a highway is not limited to the traveled path. State v. Merrit, 35 Conn. 314, 318; Burnham v. Hotchkiss, 14 Conn. 311.

So, it is no answer to the charge of a nuisance that even with the obstruction in the highway there is still room for two or more wagons to pass, nor that the obstruction itself is not a fixture. Cohen v. New York, 112 N. Y. 532, 535, 4 L. R. A. 406, Reversing 43 Hun, 345.

And if the structure is placed on the highway so as to obstruct public travel, the commissioners of highways of the town, in the discharge of their duty to keep the same in order and remove all obstructions therefrom, may summarily remove the same. Van Wyck v. Lent, 33 Hun, 301, 303.

Again, the obstruction of the use of a street so as to unreasonably impede travel and render its use inconvenient or dangerous to the traveler may become a common nuisance. Jackson v. Castle, 82 Me. 579, 581, 50 Me. 119; Holmes v. Cortheill, 80 Me. 31.

character as to constitute a public nuisance, the power of the municipality, under its charter, to abate the same in a summary manner is constitutionally conferred and legally resorted to. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Buffalo, 4 App. Div. 562.

A city is armed with ample authority to remove from its streets and thoroughfares every obstruction or impediment to their free use as such by the public, unless legalized by the authority of law. Philadelphia v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 58 Pa. 253, 253.

The government of every incorporated town has a right to improve the streets for public purposes, whether as highways or places for cisterns or wells. Barter v. Com. 3 Penr. & W. 253, 259.

A city has power to prevent an improper obstruction of its streets and sidewalks, and to remove nuisances occasioned thereby. Terre Haute v. Turner, 36 Ind. 522, 527.

The power of such authorities to remove obstructions on streets was also recognized in Grand Rapids v. Hughes, 15 Mich. 54, although the question of nuisance was not raised in that case.

So, the case of Dudley v. Frankfort, 12 B. Mon. 610, upholds the right of municipal corporations to abate and remove an obstruction upon the public street although the question of nuisance does not arise therein.

Again, in Hart v. Broomfield Twp. 15 Ind. 226, the court upheld the right of the municipal authorities to prevent and abate obstructions on a public highway, although in that case the question of nuisance did not arise.

In Ex parte Taylor, 87 Cal. 91, the defendant, who was convicted and fined for the violation of an ordinance which prohibited the obstruction of the streets or sidewalks and provided a penalty therefor, contended that such ordinance was unconstitutional and void as contrary to § 6 of art. 11 of the state Constitution, which provides that a municipal corporation cannot be created by special laws, and that all charters theretofore granted should be controlled by general laws, and that the municipality had no authority to determine and declare what should constitute a nuisance upon a public street, or to provide for the punishment thereof for the reason that the general law had so provided. The court held that the ordinance was not in conflict with the law, as it proceeded upon the theory that the state law itself had declared the obstruction of the street to be a nuisance or a misdemeanor and simply forbade the obstruction or declared it to be unlawful in the exercise of its police power, and the authority expressly granted by the charter, the penalty inflicted not being different in character or in excess of the one prescribed by the general law, although less in degree.

It has been stated that it is enough if the road obstructed be a public one de facto, in order to make the obstruction a public nuisance. State v. Spinbour, 19 N. C. (2 Dev. & B. L.) 547; State, Dawes, v. Hightstown, 45 N. J. L. 127.

A thoroughfare or way leading from one highway to another is a highway, the stopping or obstructing of which is a nuisance, and punishable as such. State v. Duncan, 1 McCord, L. 352.

All roads laid out by public authority must be regarded as public roads in the obstruction of is to test the validity of the ordinance, and therefore we need not stop to discuss any technical objections that might be urged to the form of the bill, or other pleadings, especially as the only point suggested has been remedied by an agreement filed in this court to correct an omission from the record. The ordinance, after enacting that dogs shall not be permitted to run at large within the corporate limits of Hagerstown, provides for the appointment of which a public nuisance may be committed. State v. Mobley, McMull, L. 44, 48.

The power of a municipality to remove encroachments and nuisances from highways is only an exercise of police power ministerial in its nature, designed to relieve the public from such obstructions in streets as are apparent or readily ascertainable without the necessity of adjudications. State, Dawes, v. Hightstown, 45 N. J. L. 501.

In giving power to regulate the use of the streets and passages, and to remove obstructions therefrom, a city charter contemplates the preservation of actual, and not theoretical, easements, and the protection of the community against actual nuisances which interfere with the accustomed use of the passages. Jackson v. People, 9 Mich. 111, 122, 77 Am. Dec. 491.

A duty is devolved upon a common council of a city in their legislative capacity to prevent, by adequate laws, all improper encroachments upon the highway, and to provide for the removal of all obstructions, and also to prevent other nuisances which may injuriously affect the health, property, or rights of the citizen. Giffin v. New York, 9 N. Y. 456, 461, 61 Am. Dec. 700.

An unlawful obstruction placed upon a street is a nuisance which may be abated by any citizen if he proceeds in a proper manner, provided the nuisance is one which the law holds to be such, and not merely declared so by any board or individual. Hoffman v. Schultz, 31 How. Pr. 385, 394, 395.

The powers conferred upon boards of health under the New York act of 1866, chap. 74, do not justify tearing down or removing a public market in the city of New York as a nuisance or an obstruction to the streets, their powers under that act being limited to the removal of such nuisances as are detrimental to the public or dangerous to life or health. Hoffman v. Schultz, 31 How. Pr. 385, 394, 395.

Under § 103, N. Y. Rev. Stat., as amended by chap. 125 of the Laws of 1870, relating to encroachments upon highways laid out or ascertained, described, and entered of record in the town clerk's office, the notice to remove the obstructions from such highways must specify the breadth of the road originally intended, and therefore an order which required the supposed encroachment to be removed so that such highway may be of the breadth of 3 rods is defective as not showing the breadth originally intended. Cook v. Covil, 18 Hun. 288, 290.

And any obstruction in or encroachment upon a highway which unnecessarily impedes or incommodates the lawful use of such highway by the public is a public nuisance, and may be summarily abated. Hubbell v. Goodrich, 37 Wis. 84, 86, citing Angell on Highways, §§ 223, 274.

Again, encroachments upon the right to pass along a public highway which amount to public nuisances may be prosecuted on behalf of the public, and damages obtained therefor. Charlotte v. Pembroke Iron Works, 82 Me. 391, 8 L. R. A. 823.

An obstruction placed in a street or other highway without authority of law, such as a building or a fence across it, is a nuisance, and may be removed by the lawful authorities. Compton v. Waco Bridge Co. 62 Tex. 715.

not more than three persons to "seize and kill, subject to the subsequent provisions of this ordinance, all dogs running at large within the corporate limits of the city of Hagerstown. All dogs so seized by them shall be detained in a suitable place, to be provided by him or them, for a period of twenty-four hours. They shall notify every owner of any dog who has a collar upon his dog's neck with the owner's name engraved thereon, of such seizure, that the same may be ransomed upon the payment of the fees hereinafter specified." It is further enacted by § 3 "that any owner of any dog seized under the provisions of this ordinance may redeem the same upon the payment to the person so seizing and impounding said dog the sum of $1. All dogs not redeemed shall be killed as hereinafter required," and by § 5 "that it shall be the duty of every man appointed to seize dogs under the provisions of

So, erections upon a public square are public nuisances. Rung v. Shoneberger, 2 Watts, 23, 26, 28 Am. Dec. 93.

Yet conductors of eave spouts and bay windows are not necessarily obstructions to a highway when so elevated as to be withdrawn from it, but the erection and use of any fixture or a deposit of any timber or other article thereon is a public nuisance. Hyde v. Middlesex County, 2 Gray, 267.

Steps projecting over the line of a highway are obstructions on the surface and nuisances. Hyde v. Middlesex County, 2 Gray, 267.

Again, a stairway extending into a public hallway in a manner detrimental to the public is a preasure, and a nuisance per se. Pettis v. Johnson, 56 Ind. 129.

And a tent of such a size and character as to obstruct travel, permitted to stand within the limits of a highway, partly upon the traveled path of the principal thoroughfare, for some days, and calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness, is a nuisance rendering the highway unsafe and inconvenient. Ayer v. Norwich, 39 Conn. 376, 379, 12 Am. Rep. 306.

Again, the exhibition of effigies by one in the window of his house, thereby drawing large crowds in the street, and so obstructing the use of the same by the public generally, creates a public nuisance, though the same may not be of a libelous character. Rex v. Carlile, 6 Car. & P. 636; Com. v. Haines, 4 Clark (Pa.) 17.

In Conestoga & B. S. Valley Turnp. Road Co. v. Lancaster City, 151 Pa. 543, it was held that a toll gate erected across a turnpike road within the city limits under the authority of a turnpike act, and in existence over twenty years without objection, was not a public nuisance which the municipal authorities could summarily remove, the court relying upon the prior decision in Easton, S. E. & W. Pass. R. Co. v. Easton, 133 Pa. 505.

So, a toll gate across a highway leading to a bridge was held a nuisance, in Columbus v. Rodgers, 10 Ala. 37.

And a gate erected across a highway pursuant to legislative authority, under which the party so erecting has a right to toll for a limited period, becomes a nuisance after the expiration of such period, which may be abated by any person. Adams v. Beach, 6 Hill, 271, 275.

In James v. Hayward, Cro. Car. 184, a new gate erected across a public highway was held a common nuisance and abatable as such, even though it was not fastened.

Again, an object situated in a highway in such a way as to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness amounts to a public nuisance. Dimock v. Suffield, 30 Conn. 129. Clinton v. Howard, 42 Conn. 295, and Ayer v. Norwich, 39 Conn. 376, 12 Am. Rep. 306, to the same effect.

And a wheel on the outside of a mill near to the highway, so situated as to frighten horses passing there, is a public nuisance. House v. Metcalf, 27 Conn. 681. In this case, however, the action was of a private nature. See also Smith v. Stokes, 4 Best & S. 84, 32 L. J. M. C. N. S. 199, 8 L. T. N. S. 425, 11 Week. Rep. 753, infra.

In Runyon v. Bordine, 14 N. J. L. 472, it is said that no man may dig a ditch in a lane of a city 39 L. R. A.

without authority, and that a ditch so dug is a common nuisance.

Inclosing a portion of a public common was held to be a nuisance as against the public, in State v. Woodward, 23 Vt. 92, 100.

And the fencing in of a part of a street has been held to be a public nuisance. Lingsdale v. Bonton, 12 Ind. 467.

In Lowell v. Short, 4 Cush. 275, the city was allowed to recover against the defendant damages which it had been compelled to pay by reason of the defendant's nuisance, consisting in a deposit of earth, stones, and gravel in a street, thereby creating a nuisance.

And a similar action was upheld in Lowell v. Spaulding, 4 Cush. 277, 50 Am. Dec. 775, where an open cellarway constituted the nuisance.

So, in Indianapolis v. Miller, 27 Ind. 394, a deposit of sand and gravel in the street under a license for an unreasonable time, and not removed after notice, is a public nuisance.

Leaving a pile of wood in the road, through the breaking down of a wagon in which it is drawn, creates an obstruction of the road and becomes a nuisance if left there for an unreasonable time, Northrop v. Burrows, 10 Abb. Pr. 366.

And a portable steam engine upon wheels and drawn by horse power, placed within 4 yards of the center of a road between such road and a barn, and used to drive a threshing machine in the barn, but not fixed thereto or to the soil, and not protected by any building, screen, or other cover, and calculated to frighten horses, is a nuisance and an obstruction to the highway, within the provisions of the English statute 5 & 6 Wm. IV. chap. 50, § 70, the object of which act is to prevent danger to passengers, horses, and cattle. Smith v. Stokes, 4 Best & S. 84, 32 L. J. M. C. N. S. 199, 8 L. T. N. S. 425, 11 Week. Rep. 753.

And in support of the power of a municipal authority to proceed in a summary manner for the abatement of nuisances under the provisions of its ordinance, made pursuant to the provisions of the charter, it has been stated that to force the municipal authorities to a suit in the courts to secure the removal of obstructions from a street, where such obstructions are declared to be a nuisance, would to a considerable extent defeat the objects and purposes contemplated in the creation of municipal government. Compton v. Waco Bridge Co. 82 Tex. 715.

So, when the boundaries of a highway are certain the continuance of a building in such highway cannot be justified by any length of time less than forty years, but the same may be abated as a nuisance. Com. v. Blaisdell, 107 Mass. 234.

A permanent obstruction, such as trees standing within a sidewalk or traveled street, or stone columns which may interfere with public travel, constitutes per se a public nuisance, and may be summarily removed by direction of a common council. Chase v. Oshkosh, 81 Wis. 313, 15 L. R. A. 553.

The question whether a particular use is or is not an unreasonable one and a nuisance is a question of fact for the jury. Allegheny v. Zimmerman, 95 Pa. 287, 293, 40 Am. Rep. 649; People v. Carpenter, 1 Mich. 273, 280.

this ordinance to kill all dogs not ransomed at 10 A. M. of the morning of the day after they shall have been detained twenty-four hours in the most humane manner possible." The charter of Hagerstown contains no express provision prohibiting dogs from running at large. The only reference made to them is a power "to levy a tax and impose a license on dogs." It does, however, vest the mayor and council with power "to pass all ordinances necessary for the good government of the town; to prevent, remove, and abate all nuisances or obstructions in or upon the streets," etc. And, after enumerating the above and other powers § 171 of article 23 of the Local Code, which includes this charter, provides that "for the purpose of carrying out the foregoing powers, and for the preservation of the cleanliness, health, peace, and good order of the community, and for the protection of the lives and property of the citi-

A private person or corporation constructing a ditch or canal across a public highway or street so as to render the highway or street of a town or city unsafe or inconvenient for public travel, and maintaining such a ditch without a bridge or other safe and convenient way of crossing, is guilty of maintaining a public nuisance under § 3620, Idaho Rev. Stat. Lewiston v. Booth (Idaho) 34 Pac. 809.

In Denver v. Mullen, 7 Colo. 345, 354, wherein the city authorities sought to abate a ditch across a certain street as a nuisance, it was held that, even if it were admitted that such ditch, by reason of its obstruction to the use of the streets, was a nuisance, yet it was not a nuisance per se, being constructed for a necessary, useful, and lawful purpose and used for such purpose, and was therefore in its nature not a nuisance as a matter of law, neither was it such as a matter of fact, there being no hurt, detriment, or offense to the public or to any private citizen, the only reason by which it had become a nuisance being the change of circumstances brought about either by the ditch itself or its use, there being no bridge over it at street crossings; and therefore the question whether the reason of the growth of the town, beyond the ditch, thereby causing the laying of streets across its course, had made it a nuisance, was a matter of fact which must first have been ascertained by judicial determination before it could be lawfully abated either by the public or by a private person.

In State, Dawes, v. Hightstown, 45 N. J. L. 127, the common council passed an ordinance ordering the removal of certain obstructions and encroachments on certain streets within a given time, and notice was given to the owner requiring him to remove such encroachments and obstructions within sixty days. It did not, however, appear that the place where such obstructions were alleged to exist was a street de facto, or had ever been used as part of a street, the owner having been in possession of the same for twenty-five years, and it not appearing that he had any positive notice of a meeting of the council at which such order was passed, or that the meeting was designed to adjudge that his property was a nuisance. It was held that the proceedings of the council were void, as he had no opportunity to be heard, the power of the common council to prevent and remove all encroachments upon the streets being only a police power and not extending to cases of a doubtful or uncertain nature which require to be first lawfully determined.

The Connecticut statute preventing and abating nuisances upon highways, rivers, and watercourses and fining the persons so erecting buildings obstructing a highway, does not apply to one continuing to use such erection not so constructed by himself, where it has been used by the party erecting it for more than thirty years. State v. Brown, 16 Conn. 54, 57.

So, the Michigan Compiled Laws, chap. 23, § 2, amended by the act of 1861 (Session Laws 1861, p. 153), gives power to institute proceedings in cases of encroachments on a highway "when a highway shall have been laid out and opened," and does not apply to a highway existing only by dedication or user, but only to highways actually laid out and opened under such statute. Roberts v. Cottrellville 89 L. R. A.

Highway Comrs. 25 Mich. 23, 27. Following Parker v. People, 22 Mich. 93.

In Campau v. Button, 33 Mich. 625, the highway commissioners proceeded under the Michigan Statute, chap. 27, as amended by act 65 of the Laws of 1875, to establish the existence of an encroachment on an asserted highway or street, but as the record showed no evidence that the supposed encroachments were within a platted street or laid-out highway, and as the main question was whether the place occupied by such encroachment was a public or private ground, and as it did not appear that the erection touched any laid-out and opened highway, the court quashed the proceedings, jurisdiction only attaching in regard to something done against the highway, and not to any real controversy respecting the existence of the highway itself.

The Michigan Compiled Laws of 1875, §§ 1290, 1291, p. 94, relative to encroachments upon highways, extend only to such ways as are laid out under the statute, and not to those which exist merely by user. People v. Smith, 42 Mich. 138.

So, in Gregory v. Stanton, 40 Mich. 271, where the proceedings were by way of certiorari to bring up proceedings taken by the commissioners of highways to establish the existence of an encroachment upon a highway, but the exact location of the road was disputed, the court dismissed the proceedings, as the question of encroachment or no encroachment depended upon first ascertaining the location of the road, the court relying upon the prior cases of Parker v. People, 22 Mich. 93; Roberts v. Cottrellville Highway Comrs. 25 Mich. 23, 27; Campau v. Button, 33 Mich. 627.

And in Gregory v. Knight, 50 Mich. 61, the highway commissioners sought to remove an encroachment from a highway, but the defendant denied both the encroachment and the existence of the highway as one regularly laid out, and did not appear or recognize the validity of the inquest. Neither the notices nor the finding of the jury furnished any means of ascertaining the extent of the alleged encroachment or the distance from what was claimed to be the true highway line as required by Mich. Comp. Laws, § 1290. The court quashed the proceedings, holding that in such cases the encroachment must be so described as to show in what direction and how far it extends beyond the line of the highway, so as to enable everyone to know what is the line to which it must be removed, and what are the road bounds, no jurisdiction existing by such special and summary proceedings to determine disputes concerning private estates or boundaries, the determination of which must be by legal process, as it is only when the existence and bounds of the highway are not really questionable that the question of encroachments can be thus summarily settled.

The ex parte action of surveyors and commissioners of highways cannot affect vested rights or settled controversies although they may be useful witnesses upon questions of encroachments upon highways when they speak of matters with which they are familiar, but they have no greater right than anyone else to determine starting points or boundaries. Gregory v. Knight, 50 Mich. 61.

zens, and to suppress, abate, or discontinue, or cause to be suppressed, abated, or discontinued, all nuisances within the corporate and sanitary limits of said town,—they may pass all ordinances or by-laws from time to time necessary." To insure the observance of such ordinances, it authorizes the imposition of fines, and imprisonment in default of the payment of fines imposed. If dogs by running at large had become nuisances, or offended any of the other provisions of the charter quoted above, it would seem clear that the mayor and council could adopt reasonable measures to abate the nuisance or remedy the evil, although there is no express provision in the charter prohibiting them from running at large. We held in Cochrane v. Frostburg, 81 Md. 54, 27 L. R. A. 728, that the mayor and city council of Frostburg had power to prevent cattle from running at large under the general authority to

But every obstruction to a highway is not a nuisance. People v. Carpenter, 1 Mich. 273, 289; Allegheny v. Zimmerman, 95 Pa. 287, 40 Am. Rep. 649; Com. v. Hauck, 103 Pa. 536, 537; Gitt v. Hanover, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 606.

Neither is every obstruction of a street or highway objectionable, but if unreasonably continued or without direct legal right it becomes such, and therefore a public nuisance. Ely v. Campbell, 59 How. Pr. 333, 335.

In King v. Russell, 6 Barn. & C. 566, it is said that, so long as the alleged obstruction is for the public convenience, there can be no reasonable ground of complaint.

It is not every obstruction, irrespective of its character or purpose, that is illegal though not sanctioned by express legislative or lawful authority. On the contrary, the right of the public to the free and unobstructed use of a street or way is subject to reasonable and necessary limitations. Simon v. Atlanta, 67 Ga. 618, 622, 44 Am. Rep. 739.

Obstructions of a partial and temporary character from the necessity of the case and for the convenience of mankind will be justified, when such obstructions occur in the customary or contemplated use of the highway, and the question of their necessity and reasonableness and of the customary or contemplated use is one for the consideration and determination of the jury under all the circumstances of each particular case. Graves v. Shattuck, 35 N. H. 257, 264, 60 Am. Dec. 536.

Yet obstructions to streets, in order to render them legitimate, must be such as are reasonably necessary, and those exercising the right must do so, so as to discommode others as little as is reasonably practicable, and they must remove the obstruction or impediment within a reasonable time, having regard to the necessities and circumstances of the case. Simon v. Atlanta, 67 Ga. 618, 622, 44 Am. Rep. 739.

If one occupies the public street in connection with the purposes of his trade or business, for an unreasonable time, and thus causes inconvenience and a nuisance to the public, he is guilty of creating a public nuisance, and he cannot justify his occupation of such road by reason of the inconvenience of his own premises. Rex v. Jones, 3 Campb. 220.

And a license by the legislative act legalizing obstructions in the streets of a municipality, which otherwise would be nuisances, is dependent upon the legislative will, and may be withdrawn. Winter v. Montgomery, 83 Ala. 569, 568.

In Graves v. Shattuck, 35 N. H. 257, 264, 60 Am. Dec. 536, it is said that a jury must determine from all the circumstances of each particular case whether any object permanently placed, temporarily left, or slowly moving in a public highway, is or is not a common nuisance, and at common law such determination must depend upon their finding of the fact whether the given object, under all the circumstances accompanying its occupation of the highway, did or did not necessarily obstruct the free passage of the public over and upon such highway.

A water tank used for watering purposes, erected in the streets under authority of the municipality, cannot be removed without compensation to the owner unless it proves a nuisance, as it is not one per se. Savage v. Salem, 23 Or. 381, 24 L. R. A. 787.

So, every encroachment upon a highway is not a nuisance per se; a nuisance must be something that annoys the public. Griffith v. McCullum, 46 Barb. 561, 564; Burnham v. Hotchkiss, 14 Conn. 311; State v. Merritt, 35 Conn. 314, 318.

And therefore an encroachment which does not prevent the use of the street for ordinary purposes is not an obstruction constituting a nuisance. Howard v. Robbins, 1 Lans. 63.

A sleigh left standing for ten or fifteen minutes for the purpose of unloading goods ought not to be regarded as an obstruction or nuisance in a village street, the streets being intended for the purpose of permitting the transportation of goods and the like in vehicles which may be unloaded upon the sidewalks. Sikes v. Manchester, 59 Iowa, 65, 69.

Yet a city has no power to authorize the placing of any encroachment or obstruction upon any street or sidewalk except the temporary occupation thereof during the erection or repairing of a building on a lot opposite the highway. It cannot legalize a nuisance. Cohen v. New York, 113 N. Y. 533, 537, 4 L. R. A. 406; Ely v. Campbell, 59 How. Pr. 333; People, O'Reilly, v. New York, 59 How. Pr. 277; Lavery v. Hannigan, 20 Jones & S. 463.

Temporary obstructions in a street which are reasonable and necessary for the erection of a building upon an adjacent lot do not constitute a nuisance provided they are not unreasonably prolonged, but such obstructions are justified only so long as they are reasonable and necessary, and will not justify the owner of the lot in leaving an excavation in the street in an unsafe condition. Stuart v. Havens, 17 Neb. 211.

If the city has been compelled to pay damages for injuries sustained by reason of an excavation in a highway which created a nuisance, it may recover against the party occasioning the same, and are not in part delicto as they are bound to keep the same free from nuisances. Portland v. Richardson, 54 Me. 46, 39 Am. Dec. 720.

As to an authorized excavation, see McNaughton v. Elkhart, 85 Ind. 384, 387, infra, IV.

Where the city council have no authority given to extend the steps of a building in a particular street, and the ordinance specially forbids it, any extension thereof by the owner is an unauthorized obstruction of a public highway, and a nuisance which the public authorities have a right to abate. Norfolk City v. Chamberlain, 29 Gratt. 534, 539.

Where the charter confers power to prevent the obstruction and encroachment upon a public street as a nuisance, and to remove the same after notice to the owner, any authority or license given by the authorities for the erection or extension of the front steps of a building into the highway is ultra vires, and cannot bind such corporation. Norfolk City v. Chamberlain, 29 Gratt. 534, 539.

A city has a right to maintain an action to prevent the unlawful obstruction of a street, where such obstruction amounts to a public nuisance. San Francisco v. Buckman, 111 Cal. 25, 31.

So, although an obstruction or invasion of a public street may, at common law, or by reason of some act prohibited by ordinance, create and con-pass ordinances to remove nuisances from the streets, and to ordain and enforce all ordinances, rules, and regulations necessary for the peace, good order, health, and safety of the town, and of the people and property therein. That being so with reference to such animals as cows, it would seem to be equally clear that, under such powers as the mayor and council of Hagerstown have, dogs can be prohibited from running at large on the streets and alleys of the city.

It was said by the learned judge who decided the case below, that "I am not to be understood as deciding that the municipal authorities have not the power to provide for the impounding of all dogs or other animals running at large upon the streets, for the killing of such as have no owners, and for the removal and suppression of those having owners from the streets and highways of the town;" but he was of the opinion that the ordinance was void, because it did not provide for notice to the owners of the dogs taken under its provisions. It seems to us that when it is deterstitute a nuisance per se, and though the city may have the power to abate it without judicial ascertainment, yet the right to proceed by way of suit also exists as a cumulative remedy to abate a nuisance and to cause the removal of the obstruction. Liano v. Liano County, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 132, 134.

The removal of obstructions in, or changing the grade of, a street is incidental to the power to keep the street in repair and free from nuisances if it is necessary for the adequate exercise of that power. Wabash R. Co. v. DeFrance, 167 U. S. 88, 42 L. ed. 87.

Under a city charter empowering the council to make regulations to secure the general health of the inhabitants and prevent and remove nuisances, and to open, alter, abolish, extend, establish, etc., the streets of a city, an ordinance directing the marshal to remove obstructions in certain streets which prevent the public from free access to and crossing the river at certain points used as public fords, can be properly enforced. Compton v. Waco Bridge Co. 62 Tex. 715.

In Skaggs v. Martinsville, 140 Ind. 478, 33 L. R. A. 781, an ordinance prohibiting the flowing of water from a flowing well or spring upon any street or alley was held to be within the grant of power to control streets and enforce sanitary regulations, and was not unconstitutional, the public health and safety being a proper subject of legislation.

But where power is given to regulate the use of alleyways, and to remove obstructions from them, a city charter contemplates the preservation of actual and not theoretical easements, and the protection of the community against actual nuisances which interfere with the accustomed use of such passages. Jackson v. People, 9 Mich. 111, 77 Am. Dec. 491, 497.

A municipal corporation may proceed by way of injunction to restrain a nuisance, such as the obstruction of a public highway, the injury being to the property of such corporation immediately. Moyamensing Comrs. v. Long, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 143.

Permitting a raft of wood to lie longer in a place than the regulations of the city authorities require is productive of a nuisance, public in its character, and which the city authorities have power to abate, inasmuch as it obstructs or annoys such things as are of daily convenience and use. Tourne v. Lee, 8 Mart. N. S. 548, 20 Am. Dec. 261.

So, an action will lie by a city against a county, to abate and remove a county jail and the cesspool connected therewith from a public square of the city, the same being an obstruction in the nature of a purpresture, a public nuisance, and also for an abatement of the cesspool as a nuisance, resulting from its improper construction, the same being dangerous to the public health. Liano v. Liano County, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 132.

Where the statutes point out the remedies given to the board of highway commissioners of the town for the removal of encroachments upon a highway, they must adhere to such remedies, and cannot cause such obstruction to be otherwise removed upon the ground that it is a nuisance. Griffith v. McCullum, 46 Barb. 561, 564. Hubbell v. Goodrich, 39 L. R. A.

37 Wis. 84, 86, and Wyman v. State, 13 Wis. 664, infra, to same effect.

In People, Chandler, v. Smith, 93 Cal. 490, the action was brought to abate a nuisance caused by the obstruction of a public street in a city, but as the question turned upon the admissibility of a judgment recovered in a former action brought against the city, by which action the plaintiff established his title to the land in question, the question of the power of the authorities to abate such a nuisance was not determined.

Water pipes laid by the water commissioners, exposed above the surface and therefore not in the required position, and liable to injury and destruction from frosts and the effects of public travel, are a public nuisance, and may be removed by such commissioners, and also, in case of their refusal or neglect to interfere, by the public authorities, the same being an obstruction to the highway and a public nuisance. Jersey City Water Comrs. v. Hudson, 13 N. J. Eq. 420, 425.

In that case, however, the court refused to proceed by way of injunction to abate such nuisance, for the reason that although equity has jurisdiction by way of injunction to restrain a public nuisance, yet it will not interfere in cases where the object can be attained in ordinary tribunals.

But if the obstruction or encroachment is not a public nuisance, and is not wilfully placed in the highway, the supervisors have no power to cause the summary removal thereof; and in such a case if a remedy is given by statute it must be resorted to. Hubbell v. Goodrich, 37 Wis. 84, 86; Wyman v. State, 13 Wis. 664.

The obstruction or encroachment contemplated by § 1326 of the Wisconsin Revised Statutes must be placed intentionally, wilfully, and maliciously. Pauer v. Albrecht, 72 Wis. 416; State v. Leaver, 62 Wis. 387; Hubbell v. Goodrich, 37 Wis. 84; State v. Preston, 84 Wis. 675; Childs v. Nelson, 69 Wis. 125.

In Fresno v. Fresno Canal & Irrig. Co. 98 Cal. 179, 180, action was brought by the city to abate as a nuisance a certain ditch or canal which ran through parts of certain streets of the city, which canal had been constructed at great expense more than five years before the incorporation of the city and in the face of and without objection of the supervisors of the county or of the public, and the court held that under such circumstances if the nuisance existed merely in the manner in which the canal was conducted or managed it was a nuisance which could be remedied without a total destruction of the property, and therefore the company should be enjoined from conducting the canal in such a manner as to make it a nuisance, but that a total destruction of the property should not be decreed, and the court reversed the order of the court below which ordered the canal to be entirely abated, filled up, and destroyed as a nuisance per se. In this case the canal had existed for over eleven years prior to the abatement of the nuisance.

As to authorized obstructions on streets, see note to Spencer v. Andrew (Iowa) 12 L. R. A. 115.

Upon the question of proceedings by way of mandamus to compel the removal of obstructions from highways, see note to People, Brokaw, v.

mined, as we do, that the power was vested in the mayor and council to prevent dogs from running at large, and to enforce it by impounding them, the case is practically determined in favor of the city. It is true that dogs are now generally recognized as property. At common law civil actions could always be maintained for their recovery, although they were not regarded as the subjects of larceny. But they are of a qualified kind of property, and such as is peculiarly the subject of police regulations. They have never ranked with such domestic animals as horses, cattle, and sheep, in which the owner has an unqualified and complete property. Various reasons have been assigned for the distinction, among which are that dogs are not used for food, husbandry, or as beasts of burden, but are generally used either for the mere whim or pleasure of the owner, or for such purposes as are calculated to arouse their natural ferocity to some extent, such as hunting, protection, etc. But probably the most potent reason for subjecting them to more control than other domestic ani-

b. Stalls, show-cases, signboards, etc.

In Lavery v. Hannigan, 20 Jones & S. 463, the displaying of goods upon the sidewalk, and the structures erected therefor, were held to amount to a nuisance, and an obstruction of the street restrainable by injunction.

Business cannot be conducted upon the public streets, and the constant placing of show-cases for the exhibition and sale of goods thereon is unauthorized and illegal. Simis v. Brookfield, 13 Misc. 569.

A fruit and confectionery store placed upon the sidewalk of a public street is a public nuisance which the authorities can remove. Com. v. Wentworth, Brightly (Pa.) 318.

So, under a charter giving power to remove buildings, posts, steps, fences, or other obstructions or nuisances in the public streets, lanes, alleys, sidewalks, or public squares of the city the authorities have power to summarily remove a fish box erected upon the sidewalk by the authority of the city officials, especially after notice. Laing v. Americus, 86 Ga. 756, 757.

In People, Bentley, v. New York, 18 Abb. N. C. 124, a mandamus was granted to compel the removal of a certain show-case as an obstruction to the street and a nuisance, the court declaring show-cases upon a sidewalk extending beyond the house line and taking up the space intended for the use of the public a nuisance removable by the proper authorities.

And in Simis v. Brookfield, 13 Misc. 569, the court upheld the action of the public authorities in removing certain show-cases in front of business premises which caused an obstruction to the sidewalk as being illegal and unauthorized. In this case, however, such show cases were not specifically declared to be nuisances by the ordinance under which they were sought to be restrained, although the cases relied upon in the opinion dealt with such and similar obstructions as nuisances.

Under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 18, § 11, Pub. Stat. chap. 27, § 15, towns have power to make such necessary orders and by-laws, not repugnant to the laws of the state, for directing and managing their prudential affairs, preserving the peace and good order, and maintaining the internal police thereof, as they may judge most conducive to the welfare of the town, and therefore an ordinance which prevents the placing of show-boards and signs upon the sidewalk so as to obstruct it, and also the carrying of placards and signs for the purpose of displaying them, the tendency of which may be to collect crowds and thus interfere with the use of the sidewalk by the public and lead to disorder, is reasonable. Com. v. McCafferty, 145 Mass. 384. In this case, however, it did not further appear whether the carrying or displaying of such placard or sign was a public nuisance.

So, an ordinance of a city council forbidding the erection of a horse rack or place for hitching horses on a public square or street or alley of a city, enacted under the charter, is sufficient to authorize the public authorities to abate a nuisance by the destruction of such racks. Samuels v. Nashville, 3 Sneed, 296.

And stands and booths erected upon the sidewalks and streets for the purposes of trade, without the sanction of the legislature, are public nuisances. Ely v. Campbell, 59 How. Pr. 333, 335.

In Costello v. State, 108 Ala. 45, 35 L. R. A. 303, a permanent and exclusive appropriation of a portion of a sidewalk next to a building for a fruit stand was said to constitute an indictable nuisance although erected on the covering of an open way to a cellar which had existed without objection for several years, and was erected under a license from the city.

So a fruit and vegetable stand extending 3 feet on a sidewalk used by a store keeper in connection with the store and in front thereof is a public nuisance abatable by the city authorities. City v. Daub, 1 Lanc. L. Rev. 306.

But the board of health of the city has no power under the New York act of 1866 to interfere with or remove stalls or stands on the sidewalks and streets of a city attached to a public market, either on the ground that the same obstruct a public street or are a nuisance, the act being construed as applicable only to such obstructions as are dangerous to life or health, and if such obstructions are not of that character the act does not apply. Hoffman v. Schultz, 81 How. Pr. 385, 386.

An ordinance providing that the sidewalk shall be of a certain width on one side of the street, and that so many feet of it next to the traveled part of the street shall be of a uniform grade and kept clear of all obstructions, permanent or temporary, leaving a certain space next to the stores without any grade to be kept for the use of the stores, which latter space is occupied by the owners of the stores and protected on the sides by iron rails (in which space the defendant placed a lemonade and ice-cream stand), is unreasonable and void, and cannot be upheld, upon the ground that such use of the street is an obstruction of the enjoyment of the same by the public and therefore a nuisance. Barling v. West, 29 Wis. 307, 315, 9 Am. Rep. 576.

In the above case of Barling v. West, 29 Wis. 307, 315, 9 Am. Rep. 576, the court stated that the trade of a lemonade and ice-cream stand was in itself perfectly lawful, and its restraint and regulation were not demanded by the public welfare, nor for the good order of the village, nor for the benefit of trade and commerce, nor for the health of the citizens, and that such an ordinance was an invasion of private rights, an unwarranted interference with an entirely innocent and lawful business; the law not allowing any right of property to be invaded under the guise of a police regulation for the preservation of health when it is manifest that such is not the object and purpose of the regulation.

In Hall's Case, 1 Mod. 76, 2 Kebble, 848, Vent. 169, it was held that a booth for rope dances erected in a public street was a public nuisance as occasioning broils and fighting and drawing rogues to the place.

And in New Orleans Gaslight Co. v. Hart, 40 La. Ann. 474, the court recognized the right of a municipality to cause the removal of lamp posts as an mals is the fact that they are so subject to hydrophobia, which is so readily communicated not only to other animals, but to human beings, when bitten by a dog afflicted with that most terrible disease. Fortunately, cases are rare, as compared with the number of dogs that are to be found in most places, but the damage that may be done by one mad dog is fearful to contemplate. Conceding, then, that the appellant corporation has the power to prohibit dogs from running at large, and knowing that the law does make a distinction between them and other domestic animals, courts cannot say, as a question of law, that an ordinance of this character is wholly unreasonable and void, as we would have to do to set it aside. We cannot assume that it may not be reasonably necessary to prohibit dogs from running at large in a city the size of Hagerstown, nor can we say that can be accomplished without some such provisions as those included in this ordinance. There are various kinds of dogs. Some are very valuable, others utterly worthless; some whose owners obstruction to the streets, although it did not appear that the same were removed as nuisances.

In Spencer v. Andrew, 82 Iowa, 14, 12 L. R. A. 115, action was brought to contest the right of the defendant to set up, maintain, and use a weighing scale in the streets of the town, and to restrain the use of the same as an obstruction to the street and a nuisance, but the court distinguished the case from that of Emerson v. Babcock, 66 Iowa, 258, upon the ground that in the case then before the court the scales were put up by permission for the purpose of serving the public need, while in the previous case there was no permission, and the maintaining of the scales was a trespass.

Yet any obstruction to the right of passage through or to the proper use of any alley by those entitled thereto cannot be considered as a public wrong, and it cannot be assumed as a matter of course that a platform erected in such an alley is an obstruction or a public nuisance,—especially where it does not cause any unusual inconvenience, an alley not being considered as a public highway or governed by the rules relating thereto. Bagley v. People, 43 Mich. 355, 38 Am. Rep. 122.

c. Buildings and fences.

In People, Wooster, v. Maher, 141 N. Y. 330, it is said that a building projecting into the street and so creating an obstruction and a public nuisance, even though originally built with the consent of the city, may be abated by the public as a public nuisance.

No private person has a right to erect any structures upon the public streets of an incorporated town for business purposes, and if he does so he may be required to remove the same and will not be thereby deprived of any right, and any permit for such purpose must be taken as a mere license and therefore revocable under § 4089 of the Iowa Code declaring buildings or other structures upon public highways to be nuisances, which § 456 gives the town council power to abate. Emerson v. Babcock, 66 Iowa, 258. In this case platform scales were removed from the streets by the city authorities under its ordinance.

Where power is given to the trustees of an incorporated village to exercise the powers and duties of highway commissioners within the limits of such village so far as such powers are consistent with other parts of the act giving power to highway commissioners, such board may proceed to remove structures which have become obstructions and nuisances upon streets without giving notice,—especially where there is a provision in the act requiring such a board so to do. Walker v. Caywood, 31 N. Y. 51, 64.

Where a building is erected so as to obstruct the public travel upon a public highway it is the duty of the highway commissioners to remove the same even in a summary manner, upon the ground that in case of such a building entirely obstructing a highway it would be absurd to hold that such commissioners must leave it until some individual who was specially injured by the nuisance, should tear it down or remove it. Cook v. Harris, 61 N. Y. 443, 454.

In Bybee v. State, 94 Ind. 443, 447, 48 Am. Rep. 175, it is said that the permanent and exclusive use and occupancy of any public street or highway by any person by the erection or maintenance of any structure thereon or beneath or above the surface, which wrongfully obstructs, or may obstruct, such street or highway, is a misdemeanor within the meaning of the Indiana statute (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 1964), punishable as a public nuisance, and that the question whether or not the particular structure obstructs or may obstruct wrongfully the public street or highway is a question of fact for the court or jury. To the same effect, Grove v. Fort Wayne, 45 Ind. 429, 15 Am. Rep. 262; Centerville v. Woods, 57 Ind. 192; Logansport v. Dick, 70 Ind. 66, 86 Am. Rep. 166.

If a building erected in a street constitutes a public nuisance, the city, through its common council, has power to abate such nuisance as often as it may be repeated, and it may also institute judicial proceedings to prevent or remove such obstructions. Cheek v. Aurora, 82 Ind. 107, 112, 113. In this case it was sought to restrain the action of the public authorities, acting under notice served by them, in pulling down, destroying, and removing certain wooden buildings with sheds and wooden structures connected therewith, which obstructed the street and excluded the public from the use thereof, but the court denied relief and upheld the proceedings of the public authorities.

So, if a street is legally established and opened, the common council of a city has full authority to order the removal, and, in case of refusal to obey the order, to remove wooden buildings standing in a street and constituting a nuisance thereon, it being the duty of the city to see that its streets are clear of nuisances and obstructions. In this case the action was in trespass against the city to recover damages for the tearing down and demolishing of the plaintiff's wooden building, but the right of the city was maintained. Hawley v. Harrell, 19 Conn. 142, 153.

Where the erection or structure itself constitutes a nuisance, as where it is put up in a public street, its removal is necessary for the abatement of a nuisance. Barclay v. Com., 25 Pa. 503, 506, 64 Am. Dec. 715.

So, where a building or structure is erected, or encroaches upon the highway, the same has been held to be abatable by the municipal authorities as a nuisance.

But a municipal corporation, before it can, by its mere declaration that a dwelling house is a nuisance, subject it to removal, must first resort to some proper judicial proceeding, giving the owner or occupant an opportunity to be heard. Tease v. St. Albans, 38 W. Va. 1, 19 L. R. A. 802, in which case it was sought to restrain the action of the city authorities in tearing down the plaintiff's house, which was alleged to encroach on a public street.

And under the Georgia Code, notice is necessary might readily come to their relief if seized for running at large, while there are others that either have no owners, or, if they have, would not be acknowledged by them if a fine might be the result of such recognition. In the case of Sentell v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. (decided by the Supreme Court of the United States on April 26, 1897), 166 U. S. 698, 41 L. ed. 1169, the court said it was practically impossible by statute to distinguish between valuable and worthless dogs, and, "acting upon the principle that there is but a qualified property in them.

and that, while private interests require that the valuable ones shall be protected, public interests demand that the worthless shall be exterminated, they have, from time immemorial, been considered as holding their lives at the will of the legislature, and properly falling within the police power of the several states." Again, it was said that legislation on the subject "is based upon the theory that the owner of a really valuable dog will feel sufficient interest in him to comply with any reasonable regulation designed to distinguish him before a house can be pulled down or destroyed by such authorities in order to abate a nuisance. Pruden v. Love, 87 Ga. 190, 192.

Any permanent obstruction to a public highway, such as that caused by the erection of a fence or building thereon, is not of itself a nuisance although it may not operate as an actual obstacle to travel, or work a positive inconvenience to anyone. State v. Edens, 85 N. C. 522, 526.

So, the public are not deprived of their rights by encroachment. Buildings erected on public grounds or on highways acquire no right either on account of time or expenditure. Philadelphia v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 58 Pa. 268, 268.

A building or a fence placed across a street or other highway without authority of law is a nuisance which may be abated by the proper authorities. Compton v. Waco Bridge Co. 62 Tex. 715.

In Garland v. Towne, 55 N. H. 55, 60, it is said that the erection or continuance of a building upon or over any highway is a nuisance. In that case, however, the action was brought by a private individual to recover damages for injury sustained by the falling of snow and ice from the roof of the building upon the plaintiff.

So, buildings and fences erected upon a public square, obstructing the public in the use of the same as a square are nuisances which a municipality has a right to abate and to restrain. People v. Bryant, 93 Cal. 248.

In State v. Mobile, 5 Port. (Ala.) 279, 30 Am. Dec. 564, the erection of a market place in the middle of a public street was restrained as a nuisance to the public, as interfering with their enjoyment of the streets.

So, the erection of a market house in the public streets or squares of a city will be restrained in equity as a nuisance at the instance of the public. Columbus v. Jacques, 39 Ga. 506, 512.

And in Com. v. Rush, 14 Pa. 186, a private dwelling house dedicated to a specific public use, mentioned in the act of legislature, erected upon a public square, was held to be a nuisance restrainable by injunction or by indictment, and not justifiable by any authority derived from the city council, the facts showing that the damage was irreparable.

Again, a building standing on wheels, and implements of machinery used in removing the same, left standing upon a highway so as to encumber and render the same unsafe, may be removed by the superintendent of streets, as a public officer of a municipal corporation, as a nuisance. Day v. Green, 4 Cush. 433.

And again, a stone walk 85 feet long and 5 feet wide inclosing an areaway to a basement erected in the highway is a nuisance per se which cannot be legalized by a license from the public authorities without express authority. Smith v. McDowell, 148 Ill. 51, 22 L. R. A. 393.

So, a building extending 10 feet 5 inches into a public road is a public nuisance removable by the highway commissioners, even though it does not entirely obstruct the road. Van Wyck v. Lent, 38 Hun. 301, 303.

And in Lutterloh v. Cedar Keys, 15 Fla. 306, a 39 L. R. A.

building erected in the center of a street 60 feet wide immediately in front of a building occupied as stores and sleeping apartments and suitable for dwelling purposes, for the purpose of a public market and as a pound for confining swine and other animals, was deemed a public nuisance. In this case, however, the action was against the municipal authorities to restrain their using the market for the purposes of creating a nuisance.

Again, in State v. Leaver, 62 Wis. 387, 392, a barn, erected within the limits of the east side of a street in the city, although it did not necessarily stop travel on the highway, was held to be an obstruction which might be summarily removed by the overseer under § 1336 of the Wisconsin Revised Statutes, although in that case the court did not expressly hold such obstruction to be a nuisance.

In Cook v. Covil, 18 Hun. 288, 290, it was said to be doubtful whether the New York Revised Statutes relating to encroachments upon highways as amended by chap. 125 of the laws of 1870, which referred only to encroachments by fences, had reference to encroachments upon a highway by means of a barn, so that proceedings could be had under such statute for the removal thereof.

A building or other obstruction of a like nature, erected upon a street without the sanction of the legislature, is a public nuisance, and, in the absence of such legislative grant, no power exists in the municipal authorities to grant permission to erect the same,—especially where the charter confers no such power. Daly v. Georgia Southern & F. R. Co. 30 Ga. 793, 797. In this case the erection consisted of a street railroad erected longitudinally upon the street.

And a city ordinance prohibiting the erection of private hospitals within the city limits upon the ground that the same may be injurious to health and so become a nuisance has been upheld in Milne v. Davidson, 5 Mart. N. S. 409, 16 Am. Dec. 189, 191.

A stone wall erected across a highway is a public nuisance. Allen v. Lyon, 2 Root. 213.

Again, a house standing upon a highway, ruinous and likely to fall down, is a public nuisance for which the occupier is answerable to the public, the danger concerning the public. Reg. v. Watts, 1 Salk. 357.

In Daublin v. New Orleans, 1 Mart. (La.) 185, the court justified the proceedings taken by the city authorities whereby they pulled down and removed a house built by the plaintiff beyond the line marked out by the city surveyor, the same being a nuisance as an obstruction of a street.

And a county jail and cesspool in connection therewith, erected in the public square of the city, is an obstruction in the nature of a public nuisance which may be abated by the public authorities. Liano v. Liano County, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 132.

So, a wall two stories high, exposed to the weather after the house is burned, situated upon the edge of a sidewalk, insecure and dangerous, is a nuisance which the municipality are bound to abate,—especially where it is shown that it cannot fall in the direction of the sidewalk without falling upon from the common herd." To show how far the courts of other states have sustained laws of this character, we will briefly refer to some of the cases. In Jenkins v. Ballantyne, 8 Utah, 245, 16 L. R. A. 689, it was held that an ordinance making a dog liable to be killed by any person unless registered and collared as provided by the ordinance, is not in violation of the constitutional provision against depriving a person of property without due process of law, but is a valid police regulation. In Nehr v.

State, 85 Neb. 688, 17 L. R. A. 771, a statute was declared valid which provided that, if a dog be found running at large without a good and sufficient collar, with a metallic plate on which the name of the owner is plainly inscribed, no action could be maintained for killing him. In Blair v. Forehand, 100 Mass. 186, 1 Am. Rep. 94, 97 Am. Dec. 82, it was decided that authority to regulate the keeping of dogs under the penalty of having them summarily destroyed, without previous adju-

it. Parker v. Mason, 39 Ga. 725, 729, 99 Am. Dec. 486.

Under a charter giving power to municipal authorities over the streets, and to remove, inter alia, buildings or other structures or nuisances therefrom, the city is justified in removing a wall at the edge of the sidewalk left in a dangerous condition by reason of fire. Parker v. Macon, 39 Ga. 725, 729, 99 Am. Dec. 486.

And a wall extending 10 feet into a highway, even though it leaves sufficient room to pass and repass safely, is a nuisance abatable by the public authorities under the Connecticut General Statutes. State v. Knapp, 6 Conn. 415, 16 Am. Dec. 68.

So, the Tennessee act of January 29, 1879, condemning all buildings, cisterns, wells, privies, and other erections in the taxing district, which on inspection are found to be unhealthy, as nuisances, does not conflict with the provisions of the Constitution. Thellan v. Porter, 14 Lea, 622, 62 Am. Rep. 173.

Where the city based its claim to relief in equity upon the ground that the encroachment complained of was a public nuisance, and impeded and interrupted the travel upon the streets, and interfered with business upon them, and that it narrowed the streets to the injury of the public and of the property owners in the vicinity, and averred that the injury to the streets and other property in the city was irreparable, but there was no finding in the decree of the court below in accordance with such allegation, and no proof in the record to sustain them, the decree of the court directing the walls of the buildings to be torn down because they encroached 44 inches upon the street was reversed. Big Rapids v. Comstock, 65 Mich. 78.

And it has been held that when the boundaries of a highway are certain, the continuance of a building in such highway cannot be justified by any length of time less than forty years, but the same may be abated as a nuisance. Com. v. Blaisdell, 107 Mass. 234.

The fact that the ashler or true wall of the front of a building is upon the line of a street as regulated by act of assembly and given to the defendant by the surveyor of the district, and that it is only an ornamental portion of the front which projects over the line from 6 to 15 inches, does not constitute the same a nuisance,—especially where it is shown that such custom has existed for years, and that the common council have not passed upon the subject. Philadelphia Presbyterian Bd. of Publication, 9 Phila. 469.

Yet even if an encroachment upon a highway by means of a building extending 6 feet into the street is a nuisance, it will justify only such a degree of abatement as will enable the public to enlarge the right of way. Howard v. Robbins, 1 Lans. 63.

Under a city ordinance declaring, inter alia, the obstruction of the public street to be a nuisance, the erection of a structure on a certain street, contrary to the provisions of the ordinance, is a nuisance, to abate which the proceedings may be brought in the name of the commonwealth for the use of the city, and the defendant cannot be arrested under a warrant in the first instance. Scranton v. Frothingham, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 639.

But the placing of a stepping stone on or near to the edge of a sidewalk for public convenience, if properly placed, does not constitute an obstruction or nuisance which the public authorities are bound to remove or become liable for damages occasioned thereby. Dubois v. Kingston, 102 N. Y. 219, 55 Am. Rep. 804.

A fence in a highway or street is a nuisance at common law. Gregory v. Com. 2 Dana, 417; State v. Merritt, 35 Conn. 314.

Such an erection is prima facie an obstruction and a nuisance. State v. Merritt, 35 Conn. 314, 317; Hubbard v. Deming, 21 Conn. 366.

And a fence so erected is removable by the supervisors of a town in a summary manner as a nuisance. Neff v. Paddock, 23 Wis. 544.

The obstruction of a public highway is an act which in law amounts to a public nuisance. Wakeman v. Wilbur, 147 N. Y. 667, 663. In this case the defendant had erected fences within 14 or 2 feet of the wagon track of the highway, and so near the same as to obstruct the highway and to hinder and prevent the free use of the same, rendering it difficult and sometimes impossible to travel thereon.

By Ohio Stat. April 15, 1857 (1 Swan & C. 880, § 2), it is declared that the obstructing or encumbering by fences, buildings, structures, or otherwise any of the public highways or streets or alleys of any city or village shall be deemed a nuisance. Little Miami R. Co. v. Green County Comrs. 21 Ohio St. 338, 348. Affirmed Lawrence R. Co. v. Mahoning County Comrs. 35 Ohio St. 8.

So, one is liable to the penalty prescribed by Ill. Laws 1874, § 58, p. 921, for encroaching upon a public highway by means of a fence erected and maintained in a longitudinal manner, the act applying to all obstructions and encroachments whether they wholly or partially obstructed or encroached upon the highway, after notice to remove the same, even though the original obstruction may have been barred by the statute of limitations. Boyd v. Farm Ridge, 108 Ill. 403. In this case however, it did not appear that the fence was specially declared a nuisance.

Yet, before the public authorities can remove a fence as an obstruction or encroachment upon a highway, they must justify their action and show that the fence is actually within the lines of the way, their power to act being confined to that territory, the mere fact of a road being traveled or legally established not justifying the removal of fences not within the lines of the way. Owens v. Crossett, 105 Ill. 354.

In Burlington v. Schwarzman, 52 Conn. 181, 183, 52 Am. Rep. 571, the court upheld the power of the municipal authorities to remove a fence erected across a public highway.

So, the mayor and aldermen of a town have power under the Mississippi statutes to remove a fence extending across a highway or street. Nixon v. Biloxi (Miss.) 5 So. 621.

And a fence erected within the limits of a highway, even though it may not extend across it, is a dication, is within the police power vested in the legislature by the Constitution of the commonwealth. In Morey v. Brown, 42 N. H. 278, a statute providing that dogs may be summarily killed if found uncollared, etc., was held to be constitutional. In Julienne v. Jackson, 69 Miss. 84, it was held that a municipal corporation may, in the exercise of the police power, provide by ordinance that unmuzzled dogs running at large shall be killed; that such ordinance did not violate the constitutional right of the owner, although his property is destroyed without notice. In State, Curtis, v. Topeka, 36 Kan. 76, it was decided that statutes and ordinances regulating, restricting, or prohibiting dogs from running at large in cities, and authorizing the summary killing of those so running at large were constitutional. In the case of Sentell v. New Orleans C. R. Co. 166 U. S. 698, 41 L. ed. 1169, many of the cases we have cited were referred to, and the principles announced by nuisance, restrainable by the public authorities. State v. Merrit, 85 Conn. 814; Langdale v. Bonton, 12 Ind. 467.

Again, where the public authorities have merely allowed a fence to remain across the street until there seems to them a need for the public use of the same and for the removal of such fence, such an erection is a mere encroachment upon the public street which the authorities may remove. Lake View v. Le Bahn, 120 Ill. 92, 104.

The action of the sergeant of the town in entering upon the land and tearing down the fence erected thereon, which fence was an encroachment and obstruction and therefore a public nuisance upon the street, was upheld in Yates v. Warrenton, 84 Va. 397, even though an adverse use and title by prescription was claimed by the plaintiff who sought to restrain the action of the authorities by injunction, there having been a proper dedication of the street to the public.

So, in Bequette v. Patterson, 104 Cal. 282, the court upheld the action of the defendant who claimed to be road overseer of the district in removing a fence as an obstruction and a nuisance upon the highway under an order from the board of supervisors, although it was contended that he was not such overseer at the date of the alleged trespass for the reason that his official bond was not approved until the day after the trespass, but it appeared that he had taken the oath of office and that his bondsman had qualified, and that he testified that in so removing he acted as road master and by the direction of the supervisors, the court considering him as an officer de facto, and stating that even if he was not, yet as the board of supervisors had charge of the roads and the obstruction was illegal he might lawfully remove it under their direction.

In Childs v. Nelson, 69 Wis. 125, the plaintiff alleged that the defendant wrongfully entered upon his premises and cut and broke down a fence thereon. The defendant justified his action under authority received from the aldermen of the city under a resolution passed pursuant to the provisions of their charter, which gave them the power to remove in a summary manner any nuisance, obstruction, or encroachments upon the streets of the city, and, it appearing that the fence was maintained within the street intentionally and wilfully after the plaintiff had knowledge that such street was a lawful one, the court upheld the summary procedure of the authorities, relying upon the previous cases of State v. Leaver, 62 Wis. 387; Hubbell v. Goodrich, 37 Wis. 84; State v. Preston, 34 Wis. 675.

Under a general borough law giving the corporate officers power to prohibit and remove any nuisance or offensive matter in the highways, or in public or private ground, it was held that the public authorities had power to pass an ordinance prohibiting the erection of barbed-wire fences within the limits of the borough, and declaring those already erected to be nuisances, and providing for their removal after notice to the owners. Bower v. Watsontown, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 116.

Where a barbed-wire fence was erected prior to the passing of an ordinance abating such fences whether previously erected or not, as nuisances, 39 L. R. A.

and was situated in the principal thoroughfare of the town at a place where there was no pavement but the streets were there used in their entire width by the traveling public, and were in a populous part of the borough and immediately opposite the depot, it was held that such fence was a nuisance per se and removable by the public authorities under the borough act after notice to the owner to remove the same. Bower v. Watsontown, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 116.

So, the Pennsylvania borough act of 1851 (Pamph. Laws, 326), does not authorize a town council to notify property owners to set back their fences along a certain street, and to remove obstructions therefrom, and to empower the borough officers to remove them in case of noncompliance, and therefore the remedy of the property owner is at common law. Gilmore v. Connellsville, 15 W. N. C. 342.

Where the authorities have power to abate nuisances after notice, the notice must direct the removal of the nuisance itself, and therefore, where the authorities after directing the removal of a fence, remove the same themselves, their action is invalid, the nuisance not consisting in the offense itself but in the use of the land behind the same. Verder v. Ellsworth, 59 Vt. 354.

And under the power to abate nuisances and to prevent the obstruction of streets, given by a city charter, municipal authorities have no right to require the summary removal of a fence as an encroachment, where the fence is situated on a line nearly parallel to the street and does not incommode the public use of the street as a highway for teams and foot passengers, for the reason that such offense is neither a public nuisance nor an obstruction to the street, such finding being substantially that such fence does not incommode the public use of the street for any purpose, the city charter not authorizing a summary removal of a fence that is a mere encroachment, especially where a special verdict of a jury takes from it the character of a public nuisance. Pauer v. Albrecht, 72 Wis. 416.

In order to justify the summary removal of a fence as an obstruction and a nuisance and encroachment upon a highway, under § 1826 of Wis. Rev. Stat., it must be shown that the obstruction or encroachment was placed there intentionally, wilfully, and maliciously. Pauer v. Albrecht, 72 Wis. 416; State v. Leaver, 62 Wis. 387; Hubbell v. Goodrich, 37 Wis. 84; State v. Preston, 34 Wis. 675; Childs v. Nelson, 69 Wis. 125.

Where the defendant maintained a fence inclosing part of the public street intentionally and wilfully with full knowledge of the claim of the public thereto, it was held that the corporate authorities might proceed in a summary manner for the removal of such fence, special provisions being made by the city charter giving the aldermen power to remove in a summary manner any nuisance, obstruction, or encroachment upon the streets of the city. Childs v. Nelson, 69 Wis. 125, 135.

In Henshaw v. Hunting, 1 Gray, 203, 218, the defendant, the superintendent of the city streets, justified his action in forcibly entering plaintiff's close and tearing down and removing the fences, upon the ground that the fence was situated upon them fully sustained. Among other reasons for such legislation that court said: "Although dogs are ordinarily harmless, they preserve some of their hereditary wolfish instincts, which occasionally break forth in the destruction of sheep and other helpless animals. Others, too small to attack these animals, are simply vicious, noisy, and pestilent. As their depredations are often committed at night, it is usually impossible to identify the dog or to fix the liability upon the owner, who, moreover, is likely to be pecuniarily irresponsible.

In short, the damages are usually such as are beyond the reach of judicial process and legislation of a drastic nature is necessary to protect persons and property from destruction and annoyance. Such legislation is clearly within the police power of the state. It ordinarily takes the form of a license tax, and the identification of a dog by a collar and tag, upon which the name of the owner is sometimes required to be engraved; but other remedies are not uncommon." In Hubbard v. Preston, 90 Mich. 221, as reported in 15 L. R. A. 249, there is a part of a public street or way which the corporate authorities had ordered to be completed under the direction of such superintendent. The plaintiff claimed title to such land by reason of his possession thereof for upwards of twenty years, although he had no conveyance thereof. The court held that such possession of the land over which the street had been laid out by the authorities, under Mass. Stat. 1803, chap. 111, did not affect the rights of the public authorities to complete such road, as the very nature of the rights vested in the town by the laying out of the streets rendered it impossible that there should be, as against them, any adverse possession until an official order and adjudication was made that the streets should be completed, or until some act or acts were done which were equivalent thereto.

In Parker v. People, 22 Mich. 93, action was brought by the authority of the supervisors against the defendant to recover a penalty for an encroachment upon a highway by means of a fence, under Mich. Stat. 1861 (Laws 1861, p. 153), relative to obstructions and encroachments on highways, which defendant contended was erected before the highway was laid out. The plaintiffs offered in evidence a survey bill marking the line, and a certificate of the commissioners of highways showing that they had established a public highway as described in the survey bill on a certain date. The evidence was objected to upon the ground that it purported to be a survey bill of a certificate of a road established since the commission of the offense charged as an encroachment, and that it was not competent for the commissioners to lay out a road on their own motion, and that it purported to establish a road. The court stated that as the penalty sued for was only given for encroachments upon such highways as were "laid out" the evidence of user admitted on the trial to prove the existence of the way was immaterial and not pertinent to the issue, the statute only applying to such roads as were laid out by the commissioners, and not to those established by user.

In Sheldon v. Kalamazoo, 24 Mich. 383, the marshal of the city, pursuant to resolution of the village board, had entered plaintiff's premises and thrown down his fence on a claim that he was occupying part of the village street. In an action against the city for the acts of the marshal in so doing, the court held the city liable upon the ground that where a person had been in peaceable possession under color and claim of right, it was not consistent with legal policy to allow him to be forcibly ejected without legal process, as in all cases of encroachments on highways outside of municipalities, provisions were made by the Michigan statute for having the question disposed of by a peaceable legal proceeding, before anyone can be so disturbed, the court further stating that, even under the power to pass ordinances preventing encroachments and compelling their removal, such corporations could not, any more than individuals, violate the public peace, and the forcible entry was therefore not justified.

The proceedings for the summary removal of encroachments upon highways, provided for by Mich. Comp. Stat. chap. 27, cannot be instituted where the contest appears to be real and in good faith, a question of the existence of the highway claimed or a question involving the title to real estate rather than a question of encroachment upon a highway admitted to exist or the existence of which is not in good faith seriously contested or so clearly shown as to admit of no real and bona fide contest, and in such a case the proceedings should be dismissed as beyond the jurisdiction. Willson v. Gifford, 42 Mich. 454, 456. In which case the proceeding was brought for encroaching upon a highway by means of fences.

In People v. Smith, 42 Mich. 133, defendant was sued for not removing a fence charged to have been an encroachment on a highway after receiving notice from the highway commissioners to do so. Sections 1290, 1291, Comp. Laws 1875, p. 94, authorized the commissioner, where a highway had been laid out and opened, to order the removal of any fences or other encroachments within thirty days, the order to specify "the width of the road, the extent of the encroachment, and the place or places in which the same shall be with reasonable certainty." The court stated that the object of the order and notice was to point out clearly the extent of the supposed encroachment by declaring how far the fence was from where it ought to be and that a notice merely stating where the theoretical line was drawn on paper gave no information concerning its position relative to the encroachment, and that therefore the order issued was a nullity and the defendant was not informed of the extent of the commissioner's claim.

In Peckham v. Henderson, 27 Barb. 207, a fence which had existed in a highway for over thirty years was held not to be a public nuisance abatable as such by the highway commissioners, especially where there was no evidence of annoyance or inconvenience to the public and the statute of limitations, had pointed out the time of remedy, and there had been an adverse holding, the statute making a distinction between obstructing a highway and encroaching upon it by fences, the court stating that either might be made a public nuisance when of such a character as to produce annoyance of a real and substantial nature.

In the above case of Peckham v. Henderson, 27 Barb. 207, the court looked upon the case of Wetmore v. Tracy, 14 Wend. 250, where the fence was built in or near the center of a road 3 feet wide for the distance of 35 rods, and was declared to be a public nuisance abatable by the public authorities as properly decided, although it stated that it did not think it an authority for holding that all encroachments, however slight and without regard to public inconvenience or annoyance, were public nuisances.

In Waterloo v. Union Mill Co. 72 Iowa, 437, wherein the city sought to abate a nuisance caused by the construction of a mill race in the street which had been in use for over twenty years and was uncovered so that the street at that place could not be used by the public and was therefore an excellent note on the subject, where many authorities are collected. The cases are practically unanimous in holding that laws providing for the summary destruction of dogs at large contrary to statutes or ordinances are constitutional, and within the police power of the state.

The ordinance before us requires notice of seizure to be given to the owner of any dog upon which there is a collar with the owner's name engraved thereon, so it can be redeemed by the payment of the sum of $1. The same protection against the destruction of dogs is thus given owners as is done in cases above cited, where collars were required to be worn as evidence of the payment of the license fees. Section 3 provides that any owner of any dog seized may redeem the same upon the payment to the person so seizing and impounding said dog the sum of $1. A reasonable construction of that section would require that when the owner is known he at least be notified of the seizure of his dog. If a dog be of any value to his owner, its absence a nuisance, it was held that the right of the city and the public to the use and occupancy of the street was not barred by the statute of limitations, as the city was invested by the legislature with governmental powers and held the fee of the streets or an easement thereon in trust for the public, and the court therefore upheld the plaintiff's relief.

An act incorporating a city, which provides that any buildings heretofore erected within the original plan of the said city encroaching on any of the said streets shall not be deemed nuisances or abatable as such, is intended to prevent a continuance of such encroachments after such buildings shall have decayed or required rebuilding, and does not apply to buildings previously erected which are not in such a condition as to require rebuilding, the rebuilding of such as are decayed and require reconstruction being a public nuisance and abatable as such under the statute. Com. v. McDonald, 16 Serg. & R. 390, 401.

But temporary obstructions in a street, which are reasonable and necessary for the erection of a building upon an adjoining lot, do not constitute a nuisance, provided they are not unreasonably prolonged. State, Beatty, v. Omaha, 14 Neb. 265, 45 Am. Rep. 106.

Materials to be used in building may be placed in a street in the most convenient manner, and suffered to remain for a reasonable time, and such right arises from necessity in building. The right to partially obstruct a street does not, however, appear to be limited to a case of strict necessity, it may extend to purposes of convenience or ornament, provided it does not unreasonably interfere with public travel. Allegheny v. Zimmerman, 95 Pa. 287, 293, 40 Am. Rep. 649.

A temporary occupation of the street or highway by those engaged in building, or in receiving or delivering goods from stores or warehouses, or the like, may be allowed from the necessity of the case; but a systematic and continued encroachment upon the street, though for the purpose of carrying on a lawful business, is unjustifiable and a nuisance. Gerrish v. Brown, 51 Me. 256, 262, 81 Am. Dec. 569; People v. Cunningham, 1 Denio, 524, 43 Am. Dec. 709.

In McCarthy v. Chicago, 53 Ill. 38, 42, where it was sought to recover a penalty on a penal bond for the violation of a city ordinance relating to the use of the streets or sidewalks by the depositing building materials thereon and for building purposes, it is said that, as the obstruction of the streets with building materials and the sinking of deep pits in the sidewalk for the purpose of erecting houses is always attended with inconvenience to the public, and is not usually free from danger, the right to use the streets and sidewalks for such purposes must be controlled by some power in order that the public may be rendered safe and that nuisances shall not be thus created.

Where the ordinance prohibited the obstruction of any street for the purpose of building "without first obtaining a written license from the mayor and aldermen, or some person authorized by them," it was held that although such ordinance was reasonable and proper and within the powers conferred on the city council by the charter to make "salutary and needful by-laws," yet an authority given and signed by the mayor alone was of no effect. Lowell v. Simpson, 10 Allen, 88. In that case, however, it did not appear that the building was specifically declared a nuisance.

And in order to proceed in a summary way under § 1326 of Wis. Rev. Stat. an obstruction or encroachment on a highway must be so placed intentionally, willfully, and maliciously. Pauer v. Albrecht, 72 Wis. 416.

Upon the question of buildings in general as nuisances, and the powers of municipal corporations over them, see note to Evansville v. Miller (Ind.) 38 L. R. A. 161.

As to obstructions on streets or sidewalk for business or building purposes, see note to Flynn v. Taylor (N. Y.) 14 L. R. A. 556.

As to right of abutting owner to place building material on street, see note to Raymond v. Kieselberg (Wis.) 19 L. R. A. 643.

d. Things overhanging streets, etc.

In STATE v. CLARKE, an ordinance prohibiting an awning, except with a suitable frame, was held unconstitutional and void on the ground that it did not state what constituted such a frame or delegate the determination of the question to anyone, and it was further said to be doubtful whether a city had the power, by such an ordinance, to declare that to be a nuisance which was not so in fact, although the court did not pass upon such awning specially as a nuisance.

A by-law intended to restrain and regulate erections over a portion of the traveled way is within the legitimate scope of the power confined to towns and cities. Pedrick v. Bailey, 12 Gray, 163; Re Goddard, 16 Pick. 511, 28 Am. Dec. 259.

The projection into, and over the line of, the street for a short distance, of doorways, cellarways, and particularly of the eaves or cornices of houses, is a common thing in cities, and is regulated, if not entirely restrained, by municipal authorities; yet such projections when constructed with due care and proper precaution cannot be said to be nuisances in themselves, although they may undoubtedly become nuisances if in extent unreasonable, or if not properly constructed. Chambers v. Ohio Life Ins. & Trust Co. 1 Disney (Ohio) 327, 335.

A barrier stretched above the roadway or the bough of a tree overhanging it may constitute a nuisance. Barber v. Roxbury, 11 Allen, 320.

A bay window built in a second story, 16 feet above the sidewalk, projecting 3 feet 6 inches over the building line, is a nuisance which may be abated by injunction at the instance of the public authorities. Reimer's Appeal, 100 Pa. 182, 45 Am. Rep. 373.

So, bay windows projecting into and upon the street for which no permit has been obtained pursuant to a city ordinance were held to be unauthorized and within the power of the city authorities to remove as encroachments upon the city, the same being of a substantial nature, two of the windows for twenty-four hours or more will most likely be observed by himself, or some member of his family, and he can inquire at the pound for it. The worst that is likely to happen in such cases will be the payment of the dollar as a ransom fee. The mayor and council can forbid dogs from running at large, and impose heavier penalties than that fee for the violation of the law; or they can, under the express provisions of their charter, require licenses to be taken out, and, if necessary or proper for the enforcement of such requirement, direct that unlicensed dogs be killed, and that, too, without notice to the owners. But, while this is true, an ordinance embracing such drastic features should be very cautiously enforced. As many of the provisions of the one before us are, to say the least, severe, it should be construed liberally in favor of the owners of dogs, if any cases arise under it, and it ought not to be extended beyond what is absolutely required by its terms. But under the authorities we cannot say that it is unconstitutional, extending nearly 6 feet out from the house line. Simis v. Brookfield, 13 Misc. 569. In this case, however, it does not appear that the ordinance specifically declared such encroachments to be nuisances, but the court relied upon several cases holding such encroachments and obstructions to be nuisances.

And the power of a city to regulate the use of its streets, and to permit obstructions upon its sidewalks by means of cellar-doors, awnings, bay windows, and other projections of a like nature, was recognized in Livingston v. Wolf, 136 Pa. 519, in which case the court did not consider a bay window extending 27½ inches over the street line to be an obstruction, but in this case the court did not pass upon the question of nuisance.

So, a cornice projecting from a brick building and overhanging a sidewalk in such a manner as to be dangerous and liable to fall is a nuisance which may be abated by a city, inasmuch as it interferes with the safe use of the sidewalk below. Grove v. Fort Wayne, 45 Ind. 429, 15 Am. Rep. 262, 269.

In Augusta v. Burum, 93 Ga. 68, 26 L. R. A. 340, it is said that as a municipal government could not, in the absence of express legislative authority, grant the right to erect and perpetually maintain awnings over the sidewalk of the city, the rightful existence of such awnings can be accounted for only upon the assumption that they were erected under a license, express or implied, from such government, and however long they may have been in existence their continuance must be referred to the original license or to a renewal or repetition of the same. No lapse of time will render the license irrevocable, but there would be an equitable estoppel against a needless or capricious revocation until sufficient time had lapsed after the expense of erecting the structures was incurred to allow those who incurred such expense to realize in the way of use and enjoyment a fair return for their outlay. When such time has elapsed the license to continue the structure may be revoked, and unless after reasonable and fair warning they are removed by the owners, the city authorities may remove them as encroachments upon the streets no longer authorized.

Awnings are a proper subject of municipal control, as the same may create a nuisance rendering the authorities liable for damages. Drake v. Low-eil, 13 Met. 292.

Yet a wooden awning is not a nuisance per se. Hawkins v. Sanders, 45 Mich. 491.

An awning erected over a sidewalk is not ipso facto an illegal structure, and is not subject to abatement by a municipal corporation merely because it is an encroachment on the street, and is not necessarily an illegal encroachment. Hisey v. Mexico, 61 Mo. App. 248, 253.

Under § 87, Mo. Rev. Stat., power is conferred on cities of the third class to prevent and remove all obstructions and encroachments in the streets or sidewalks, and power is also given to the city council to regulate awnings, awning posts, upon the sidewalks in any public streets or public place in the city, and § 88 of the same also confers power on such cities to pass ordinances for the removal of nuisances. In Hisey v. Mexico, 61 Mo. App. 248, 253, it was held that the above sections of the statute in substance enacted that awning posts were not necessarily illegal obstructions, and that therefore the right of a city to tear them away could not be justified under the general power of the city to declare and abate nuisances, and that it was only when the structure was a nuisance per se that the decision of the municipal authorities as to its character was conclusive, and that therefore the owner might successfully contest the right of abatement by showing that the matter complained of was not a nuisance. In fact, the court following the prior decisions in St. Louis v. Stern, 3 Mo. App. 48; St. Louis v. Schnuckelberg, 7 Mo. App. 536.

Where, in an action to restrain the action of the city authorities in tearing down the plaintiff's awning or veranda as an encroachment and nuisance upon the sidewalk, the evidence showed that the structure in no wise interfered with the free use of the street and was securely built and therefore not dangerous, and that such verandas and awnings had existed in the city since its incorporation and had been in many ways recognized by the municipal authorities as legal structures,—it was held that as against the city such an awning might be maintained so long as it was a safe structure and did not materially interfere with the use of the streets, but the public authorities might in the future regulate it, although they could not abolish it merely because it encroached upon the street. Hisey v. Mexico, 61 Mo. App. 248, 253.

A city ordinance making it unlawful for any person to erect an awning before his house in any street in the city, except as provided for by such ordinance, is lawful, the municipal government having the right to secure a free and uninterrupted passage through its streets, such law being salutary and needful, and the proceedings of the mayor by virtue of the authority vested in him and also pursuant to a vote of the common council in the removal of such awning, are legal and valid, the same being a nuisance as an obstruction of the street, erected in violation of the city ordinance. Pedrick v. Bailey, 12 Gray, 161.

Again, under the charter of the city of New York of 1870, subdivision 10, § 21, which vests the common council with power to regulate the use of the streets and sidewalks for signs, sideposts, awnings, awning-posts and horse troughs, an awning erected in front of the plaintiff's premises is a nuisance and an unauthorized obstruction of the street which the commissioners of public works and the superintendent of encumbrances are bound to remove; and in such a case the court will not restrain the action of the public authorities in removing the same. Farrell v. New York, 22 N. Y. S. R. 469; Brinkman v. Elsler, 40 N. Y. S. R. 865.

So, a permanent wooden awning or roofing covering the street is a public nuisance which the public authorities have power to remove as such, after notice that the same exists, the same being obviously a nuisance in a highway which is prohibited by the city ordinance. Hume v. New York, 74 N. Y. 264.

In Simis v. Brookfield, 13 Misc. 569, it was held that and cannot hold it to be so unreasonable in its terms as to justify us in declaring it void. It may not be a wise law, and may possibly work hardship on some owners of dogs, but, if that be so, it can be remedied by the people themselves, as the mayor and council are only their representatives. It is not subject to our control; certainly not as the case is now presented to us. So far as we are informed by the record, nothing has been attempted to be done under it; yet we are asked to declare the whole ordinance null and void on its face. This we cannot do for the reasons we have given. Being of the opinion that the mayor and council had the power to pass an ordinance on this subject, and that the one before us is not unconstitutional, or in conflict with the charter, or so plainly unreasonable as to justify us in declaring it void, the decree will be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

Decree reversed, and bill dismissed, with costs to the appellants.

an awning with a roof of boards covered with a preparation of tar resting on a light wooden framework supported by ten wooden posts near the curb line, made dangerous in case of fire, from the roof of which was suspended a gas pipe with numerous jets having porcelain shades with numerous advertising cards attached thereto, and displaying articles of merchandise, was properly abatable by the city authorities under an ordinance forbidding such structures without a permit and unless made of metal or canvas. In this case, however, the awning was not specifically declared to be a nuisance although the court in its opinion relied upon several cases declaring such awnings to be nuisances.

Where, in an action against a city to recover damages occasioned by an awning overhanging the street, the city sought to free itself from liability for the reason that the common council had neglected to pass an ordinance upon the subject although § 2, subchap. 4, subd. 13, of the city charter gave such council authority by ordinance to remove and abate every nuisance, obstruction, or encroachment upon the streets or highways of the city, the court held that such omission of duty did not free the city from liability, the city still having authority to regulate and control the use of the streets. Bohen v. Waseca, 32 Minn. 176, 180, 50 Am. Rep. 564. It would therefore appear from that case that the city would have the authority to remove such an awning as a nuisance.

In Fox v. Winona, 23 Minn. 10, it was sought to restrain the action of the city authorities enforcing an order of the common council and removing a wooden awning in front of plaintiff's building. The city charter authorized the council to prevent the encumbrance of streets, and under such charter the city passed an ordinance providing that all wooden awnings theretofore erected so as to overhang or project into or over any sidewalk or street should be removed within two years after the passing of the ordinance. The court held that the word "encumbrance" was used in the sense of an obstruction, and that the authority conferred to prevent the encumbrance in the street by carriages, lumber, etc., or by "any other material or substance whatever" was an authority, not only to remove or cause to be removed anything actually obstructing the street or sidewalk, but also to take measures to prevent anything from becoming an obstruction, and therefore authorized the common council, not only to forbid the setting of posts in the street to support an awning, and to remove and cause to be removed posts already set in a street for that purpose, but on account of their liability to forbid the erection of wooden buildings whether supported by posts or not, and to remove the same or cause them to be removed. In this case the encroachment or obstruction on the highway in the manner specified was not specifically held to be a public nuisance, although similar cases have held such an obstruction to be a nuisance.

A decree in an action to restrain the proceedings of the public authorities, in tearing down an awning as an encroachment and a nuisance upon the street pursuant to the resolutions and ordinances of the municipality, from interfering in any manner or under any circumstances with the awning, is too broad, inasmuch as such a structure may become dangerous or may prove to be an actual obstruction or hindrance to the use of the street, and the court will therefore modify such decree so as to restrain the action of the municipal authorities in interfering with or removing such awning so long as it is maintained as a safe structure and does not materially interfere with the free use and enjoyment of the street. Hisey v. Mexico, 61 Mo. App. 248, 253.

And in Hoey v. Gilroy, 129 N. Y. 182, Reversing 37 N. Y. S. R. 784, the court upheld the power of the city authorities to permit the erection of an awning over the street, and restrained the action of the police authorities in removing the same as an obstruction. The question of nuisance, however, did not arise in that case.

In a case involving the question of the liability of a city for damages occasioned to the plaintiff's intestate through the falling of a sign suspended over the highway, it is stated that if the effect of the city charter and by-law is such as to constitute the flag and weight attached thereto a nuisance to the highway, it is a public nuisance, and the duty to remove it, whether imposed or assumed, is a public governmental duty. Hewison v. New Haven, 37 Conn. 475, 9 Am. Rep. 342, 346.

The main question involved in that case, however, was the liability of the city for the damages occasioned. Hewison v. New Haven, 37 Conn. 475, 9 Am. Rep. 342, 346.

In Hexamer v. Webb, 101 N. Y. 377, 385, 386, 54 Am. Rep. 703, it was held that a ladder suspended from the roof of a building upon which were two planks fastened to the ladder by ropes, thus furnishing a scaffold for workmen which was shifted from place to place as the work progressed, was not a nuisance as it was not necessarily injurious or dangerous or an obstruction to the street, and if properly used might well be employed for the purpose intended, which was the painting of the building; neither was it a violation of an ordinance prohibiting the hanging of any goods, wares, or merchandise, or of any other things, in front of any building at a greater distance than 1 foot. In this case, however, the action was to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff, who was struck by the falling of such scaffold while walking on the sidewalk.

And in Cushing v. Boston, 128 Mass. 330, 35 Am. Rep. 333, it is stated that under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 19, § 13, the city authorities of Charleston have power to maintain rules for, and to regulate the erection of, balustrades, or other projections, upon the roofs or sides of buildings as the safety of the public require, and that the construction of such section shows that it is intended to deal with those parts of a building which may project near or over a line of a highway, and which, if not properly constructed and maintained, may endanger the safety of the public; and that it does not attempt to deal with those additions to, or parts of, the building which may occupy the highway itself, such as a projecting doorstep, or obstruct travel thereon, and thus constitute a nuisance in the highway if not authorized by law. In other words,

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

STATE of Connecticut
v.
Dennison W. CLARKE, Appt.

An ordinance prohibiting the maintenance of an awning over a sidewalk "except the same be upon a suitable frame," cities are authorized to regulate the erection and maintenance of such projecting parts of a building which do not in any way obstruct the use of the highway, or constitute a defect therein, although under some circumstances they may endanger the safety of the public; but they are not authorized to regulate the erection and maintenance of permanent structures or additions to a building which stands in the highway itself, or create an obstruction therein.

A local government act for the promotion of health and the regulation of buildings in a borough, enacted, after making various provisions for the prevention of nuisances upon the pavements of streets, that no projection should be made in front of any building over or upon the pavement, was held not to apply to projections on the front of a building which were too high up to interfere with free passage along the footpath. Goldstraw v. Duckworth, L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 275, 49 L. J. M. C. N. S. 73, 42 L. T. N. S. 440, 23 Week. Rep. 504, 44 J. P. 410.

The English nuisance removal act of 1855, chap. 121, being a sanitary act, applies only to such nuisances as are injurious to health, and therefore where rainwater collects on a railroad bridge and rains through the planks dripping onto the highway and onto persons using the street, such nuisance is not within the provisions of the act so as to be subject to abatement by the authorities thereunder. Great Western R. Co. v. Bishop, L. R. 7 Q. B. 550, 41 L. J. M. C. N. S. 120, 26 L. T. N. S. 305, 20 Week. Rep. 989.

The power of a municipality over buildings in general will be found treated of in note to Evansville v. Miller (Ind.) 28 L. R. A. 181.

As to right to maintain awnings in a highway. see note to Augusta v. Burum (Ga.) 26 L. R. A. 340.

e. Trees on streets.

The cases considered in this section are confined exclusively to those holding trees upon the public streets and highways to be nuisances. There are other cases, however, of a somewhat similar nature, which treat of the question of municipal power over such trees, but do not enter into the consideration of the question from a nuisance standpoint, of which authorities Mt. Carmel v. Shaw, 155 Ill. 37, 27 L. R. A. 580, is one.

The question of the ownership and control of trees in highways will be found in note to Chase v. Oshkosh (Wis.) 15 L. R. A. 553; and the rights of abutting owners over trees is also treated in Tate v. Greensboro, 114 N. C. 392, 24 L. R. A. 671; Daily v. State, 51 Ohio St. 348, 24 L. R. A. 724; State v. Avis, v. Vineland, 56 N. J. L. 474, 23 L. R. A. 685; Mt. Carmel v. Shaw, 155 Ill. 37, 27 L. R. A. 580; Bradley v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. 66 Conn. 559, 32 L. R. A. 280.

In Burnham v. Hotchkiss, 14 Conn. 311, it is said that a tree or a post in a highway is prima facie a nuisance, but the question of nuisance in a particular case is for the jury.

But it has been stated that, independent of statute, trees in a street or highway are not necessarily a nuisance, and that in order to become such 39 L. R. A.

without specifying what should be a suitable frame, or delegating the power to determine the question to any person or tribunal, is void for uncertainty.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Middlesex County convicting him of violating an ordinance there must be an obstruction to the traveling public. Everett v. Council Bluffs, 46 Iowa, 66. To the same effect, Bills v. Belknap, 36 Iowa, 583; Patterson v. Baumer, 43 Iowa, 142.

A tree in a highway is not a nuisance per se, and only becomes such when it constitutes an actual injury or obstruction, and therefore it cannot be removed by a commissioner of highways, unless it be shown to be such, and he must justify his action, not upon his belief merely, but upon the actual fact; and therefore before such trees can be removed the owner thereof should have an opportunity to take them away, remove, and transplant them. Clark v. Daseo, 24 Mich. 88, 88.

Shade trees may stand between the sidewalk and the central part of the street without constituting a nuisance per se, yet they may become a nuisance by disease or decay, although the mere partial obstruction of a part of a street, when in fact such obstruction does not interfere with the public use, does not create a nuisance, as it does not work any hurt, inconvenience, or damage to the public necessary to constitute a nuisance. Allegheny v. Zimmerman, 95 Pa. 287, 293, 40 Am. Rep. 649.

In White v. Godfrey, 97 Mass. 472, 475, it is stated that since the passing of Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 44, §§ 6, 8, the powers given to highway surveyors have been limited, and shade trees are no longer liable to be treated as a nuisance, and looped or cut down at the discretion of every such officer, the statute in question giving the mayor and other officers power to authorize the planting of shade trees when they do not interfere with the public travel or private rights, and especially providing that the trees so planted are not to be deemed a nuisance; but upon complaint made they may be ordered to be removed if public necessity seems to so require.

In order to allow a city to remove trees in order to abate an obstruction of the public street or sidewalk, it is not essential that such trees should completely obstruct the walk or occupy the entire width thereof, the question of the degree of obstruction which will justify their removal being a question for the city. Vanderhurst v. Tholcke, 113 Cal. 147, 35 L. R. A. 287.

Very large trees standing immediately in the center of a sidewalk, thereby necessitating the public travel passing along the narrow edges or spaces left on either side thereof instead of allowing the public to pass and have the enjoyment of the entire width and surface of the walk, is an obstruction which constitutes a nuisance per se. Vanderhurst v. Tholcke, 113 Cal. 147, 35 L. R. A. 287; Chase v. Oshkosh, 81 Wis. 313, 15 L. R. A. 553.

Under a charter giving the common council the general care, custody, and control of the streets, with power to lay out the same and cleanse and repair them, and make regulations for the protection of health and safety, and to define, prevent, and remove nuisances, the city authorities have power to cause the removal of anything causing obstruction to the street or sidewalk, such as a tree standing in such sidewalk, and abate it as a nuisance, for the reason that everything which is an obstruction to the free use of a street is a public against maintaining an awning over the sidewalk. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frank D. Haines, for appellant:

This ordinance is in derogation of private right, and in its nature and effect a penal statute, and as such must be construed strictly, i. e., must not include anything not within the letter of the same, as well as the spirit.

All statutes should be free from uncertainty and in such plain language as to apprise any intelligent man of his rights or duties thereunder.

nuisance. Vanderhurst v. Tholcke, 113 Cal. 147, 35 L. R. A. 287. Taylor v. Reynolds, 92 Cal. 573, and Marini v. Graham, 67 Cal. 130, to the same effect.

A city charter expressly vesting in the city power "to suppress all nuisances" must be so construed as to apply to cases of nuisances clearly so to the detriment of public health and public convenience, and therefore where the overhanging limbs of trees on the sidewalk are not shown to have been so declared by law or ordinance, or even considered as a nuisance, they cannot be removed as such. Tissot v. Great Southern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. 39 La. Ann. 996.

Where, however, a city charter on the subject of encroachments and obstructions of streets and sidewalks gives very extensive and comprehensive powers to the common council of a quasi and legislative character, but without any particular directions as to the manner of their exercise, and such powers are peculiarly adapted to the needs of a growing and populous village or city, and clearly extend to the cutting down and removal of trees which are manifestly an obstruction to the sidewalk, even though room is left on the walk for foot travelers to pass, the same may be removed by the common council as a public nuisance. Chase v. Oshkosh, 81 Wis. 313, 15 L. R. A. 553.

So, the determination of a city council that trees growing on a sidewalk of a city are an obstruction to travel is conclusive under a charter giving them general control of the streets with power to define, prevent, and remove nuisances. Vanderhurst v. Tholcke, 113 Cal. 147, 35 L. R. A. 287.

Though a tree be planted subject to the right of the city to destroy it in the exercise of its continuing power to improve its streets, it is nevertheless the property of the owner of the fee, and when any change of grade is ordered the governing authorities of the town have the right to remove it only on the ground that it obstructs the highway and is therefore a public nuisance, or after condemnation and the payment of compensation ascertained in a mode pointed out by law. Tate v. Greensboro, 114 N. C. 392, 24 L. R. A. 671, 675.

So, the destruction of shade trees standing on the outer edge of the sidewalk in front of a residence because the municipal authorities regard them as an obstruction of the walk and injurious to health does not render the city or its authorized agents liable for damages to the abutting proprietor, and the power of a city in this respect may be delegated to the city committee composed of the board of aldermen. Tate v. Greensboro, 114 N. C. 392, 24 L. R. A. 671.

Where a public road of a certain width was set out across a common by the English inclosure commissioners, and allotments of the land on either side were made, but 25 feet only allotted by the commissioners was used as the actual road, and the sides were left uninclosed and became covered with furze and heath, and fir trees were allowed to grow there for twenty-five years or more, which the highway board cut down and advertised for sale, it was held that the right of the public was to have the whole width of the road, and not merely that part which had been used as 39 L. R. A.

the via trita, preserved free from obstructions and nuisances, and that such right had not become extinguished from the fact that the trees had been allowed to grow there for such a period. Turner v. Ringwood Highway Bd. L. R. 9 Eq. 417, 21 L. T. N. S. 424, 18 Week. Rep. 745.

In upholding the plaintiff's claim for damage against the defendant for the unlawful removal of trees upon the plaintiff's land which the defendant alleged were a public nuisance by reason of their close standing causing dampness and unhealthiness to the public, the court stated that although the defendant had no right to remove the trees himself, he had the right, if he thought they were a nuisance to the public, to complain to the selectmen of the town under the provisions of Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 48, § 4, and that it was the duty of such selectmen to decide the question whether such trees should be removed as nuisances. Bliss v. Ball, 90 Mass. 597.

But a borough ordinance passed under N. J. borough act 1878, p. 407, which declared healthy growing trees, which had been planted over twenty-five years by the owner of land on or near the edge of the roadway or a street in the borough, a nuisance and obstruction, and directing their removal as such, was declared void in State, v. Vineland, 58 N. J. L. 474, 23 L. R. A. 685.

Where the plaintiff had planted a tree in front of his house at the edge or curb line of the sidewalk as it then existed, and subsequently the borough authorities caused the pavement around the public square to be widened and laid in circular forms at the angles thereof, and such change threw the curb line in the sidewalk over 3 feet beyond the tree which had then attained considerable dimensions, but so that there was sufficient space on either side of the tree to conveniently accommodate the ordinary travel of the sidewalk, although it was shown that the trunk of the tree was an obstruction to passage owing to the extensive space it occupied, and if moved would afford much more space for passers-by, and the borough authorities had by resolution ordered the plaintiff to remove such tree and condemned it as a nuisance, yet it was held that the borough authorities had no power by such resolution and order to condemn the tree as a public nuisance, for the reason that such resolution was not general in its application nor adopted for the enforcement of any general borough ordinance or regulation, and for this reason the court restrained the proceedings of the borough authorities. Gitt v. Hanover, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 606.

In Gitt v. Hanover, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 606, it is said that, although boroughs are clothed with ample powers under Pa. act April 3, 1861, § 2, subsec. § 3, 4, to prohibit and remove obstructions in streets and sidewalks, yet such authority must, as a general rule, be exercised by virtue of ordinances of general application, and that the form of the enactment, whether by ordinance, resolution, or mere motion is not important, the material consideration being the generality of the application, and that therefore municipalities cannot by special ordinances applicable to one individual or one case permit to one person what is denied to another, or deny to one what is permitted to another. In this case the court restrained the proceedings of the borough authorities in destroying the plaintiff's shade tree under a resolution passed by the borough authorities which condemned it as a nuisance.

Under an act creating a new township, and providing that the township's committee shall have power to pass ordinances, by-laws, and regulations as they may judge proper, to direct the planting, rearing, and trimming of shade or ornamental trees, and to abate and remove all nuisances in the streets and public places of the township, and under a supplemental act conferring more ample powers upon such township committee to provide by ordinance for the regulations of the use of the public streets and to direct and regulate the planting, rearing, and trimming and preservation of shade trees on the streets and public places of the township, and to authorize or prohibit the removal or destruction of such trees, and to restrain and punish persons injuring or defacing the same,—it was held that an ordinance providing that no person should cut, trim, or break any tree, limb, or twig thereof standing upon a public street or highway of the township without first obtaining permission of the township committee or their authorized agent, and imposing a penalty for a violation thereof, was a proper exercise of the power vested in such township, and was valid as a reasonable exercise of such power. State, Consolidated Traction Co. v. East Orange Twp. (N. J.) 38 Atl. 803. In this case it was sought to restrain the action of the railroad company operating its cars through the streets from cutting off the limbs and branches of such shade trees in order to make room for its wires and poles.

IV. Nuisances relating to the use of streets.

a. Parades and noises on streets.

This section of the note is confined to the consideration of municipal authorities to declare parades and noises on the streets public nuisances, and to abate them as such. There are numerous cases wherein swearing, cursing, and other acts of a similar nature, attracting crowds of people, and causing obstructions upon the public streets, have been dealt with and punished by the municipal authorities under ordinances passed pursuant to the general exercise of police power, wherein such acts have not been specially declared nuisances nor have they been abated as such, and these are therefore not included herein.

A procession upon a public street or highway, which is lawful in itself and does not unnecessarily obstruct the use of the highway for other purposes, does not constitute a nuisance; to constitute a nuisance in such a case, the streets must be so blocked as to hinder or prevent travel or passage, and must be obstructed for a longer period than the occasion calls for, and it also seems that there must have been a criminal intent. State v. Hughes, 72 N. C. 25, 27; State v. Baldwin, 18 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. L.) 197.

Parades and processions upon the streets of a city are not necessarily productive of danger and disorder so as to render them per se the creators of public disturbances, nor are they necessarily nul-lances. Chicago v. Trotter, 136 Ill. 430, Affirming the decision of the appellate court.

It is only when political, religious, social, or other demonstrations create public disturbances, or operate as nuisances, or create or manifestly threaten some tangible public, or private mischief, that the law will interfere; and it then interferes by reason of the evil done, or apparently menaced, and not because of the sentiments or purposes of the movement, if not otherwise unlawful; and things absolutely unlawful are not made so by local authority, but by general law. Re Frazee, 63 Mich. 396, 405.

So, public parades are not unlawful in their intent, purpose, and result; they are not mala in se, and if they are to be mala prohibita, it ought to be by some general law and not by local regulation. Yet such parades are subject to the operation of the laws upon the subject of riots, mobs, unlawful assemblies, and nuisances, whenever they become so. Anderson v. Wellington, 40 Kan. 173, 178, 179, 2 L.R. A. 110.

A procession in a public street is not necessarily a public nuisance, and therefore, when the members of the Salvation Army parade the streets and sing and display a flag, which is the means they ordinarily use to attract attention and procure followers to their quarters, such use of the street does not amount to a disturbance of the public peace within the meaning of the city ordinance and charter under which the common council have power to abate and remove nuisances of every kind. People, Cartmill, v. Rochester, 44 Hun, 166.

Under a city charter prohibiting the parading and marching of any procession upon the public streets without first obtaining a permit, the general incorporation act giving the city authorities power to declare what shall be deemed a nuisance and to abate the same, a procession by the Salvation Army cannot be said to be a nuisance of itself. Although processions may become disorderly and riotous and degenerate into a mob, or a parade may be so conducted, in the banners which it displays, or the objects or purpose of its march, or the disorderly or abhorrent noises in which it indulges, as to invite a breach of the peace, or so render itself a nuisance, yet such will be exceptional circumstances, and the individuals will be subject to punishment under the law. Trotter v. Chicago, 33 Ill. App. 206, 208, Affirmed Chicago v. Trotter, 136 Ill. 430.

In this case the ordinance which provided that no parades or processions should be allowed upon the streets of a city, nor open-air meetings upon any ground abutting upon any street or avenue of the city, without a permit from the police department, which was to be issued without fee, designating the route to be followed upon the streets, was held invalid upon the ground that it gave such authorities power to discriminate, and was a delegation of power to the police authorities which it was not within the province of the common council to delegate, a municipal body having no power to transfer its legislative prerogatives and the public stress imposed upon it to a mere executive officer. Chicago v. Trotter, 136 Ill. 430, Affirming the decision of the appellate court.

In Rich v. Naperville, 42 Ill. App. 222, the court

It is the policy of the law to require of municipal corporations a strict observance of their powers.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 16, p. 34, § 28, p. 42; 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1041; Willard v. Killingworth, 8 Conn. 247, Approved in Higley v. Bunce, 10 Conn. 436.

The city council cannot interfere with the property rights and privileges of abutting owners without the sanction of a resulting public benefit, and the right to protect one's store from the sun by an awning suited to that purpose, and interfering with no one, is a right of property within the meaning of the Constitution.

Gilbert Elev. R. Co. v. Kobbe, 70 N. Y. 361; 3 Kent, Com. p. 438; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 656a, 656b, p. 777, note 2, pp. 835, 836, 878; Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 123, 43 Am. Rep. 146; Shelton Co. v. Birmingham, 62 Conn.

followed its prior decision in the case of Chicago v. Trotter, 136 Ill. 430, in declaring the city ordinance which prohibited street parades without permission of a city council void as being unreasonable, oppressive, unfair, and partial, such not being nuisances per se, and abatable as such by the public authorities.

But where processions were for an unreasonable time obstruct travel on the streets, or injuriously affect business, and be carried on to such an extent and for such time as to be an annoyance and a nuisance to the public, the city may by ordinance prohibit them and punish the person making such an unreasonable disturbance. Charlton v. Simmons, 87 Iowa, 226.

Noises in the street occasioning damage to all the citizens of the commonwealth there inhabiting, being, and residing, constitute a public nuisance. Com. v. Smith, 6 Cush. 80.

The collection of a crowd of noisy and disorderly people to the annoyance of the neighborhood, outside grounds in which entertainments with music and fireworks are being given for profit, is a nuisance for which the giver of such entertainment is liable to an injunction, although he may exclude all improper characters from the grounds, and the amusements may be conducted in a manner satisfactory to the police. Walker v. Brewster, L. R. 5 Eq. 25, 37 L. J. Ch. N. S. 33, 17 L. T. N. S. 135, 16 Week. Rep. 59.

In Fairbanks v. Kerr, 70 Pa. 86, 92, 10 Am. Rep. 664, it is stated that although a street pavement may be used in the strictness of law for public speaking, yet it may not be occupied for preaching or public worship before another's house so as to annoy him, but yet it does not follow that everyone who speaks or preaches in the street or happens to collect a crowd therein by other means is therefore guilty of a nuisance; his act may become a nuisance by his obstruction of the public highway, but it is not a nuisance per se.

The singing of an obscene song in a loud boisterous manner for ten minutes near a public street in the hearing of divers people, even though on a single occasion, is a public nuisance. State v. Toole, 106 N. C. 736; State v. Chrisp, 85 N. C. 623.

So the making of a great noise, clamor, and outcry in the public streets, by which people are drawn together and the highway obstructed, is a public nuisance; and in such a case it is sufficient if the inconvenience result as an immediate consequence of any public exhibition or act. Com. v. Spratt, 14 Phila. 365.

In Com. v. Harris, 101 Mass. 29, the defendant was found guilty of creating a nuisance by uttering loud exclamations and outcries in the public streets, thereby drawing together large numbers of people, and creating a common nuisance.

The case of Com. v. Harris, 101 Mass. 29, was followed by the subsequent case of Com. v. Oaks, 113 Mass. 8, which holds that the nuisance may exist even though the noise complained of disturbed but a single person.

A city ordinance prohibiting and forbidding all disorderly shouting, dancing, or disorderly assemblies on the part of slaves and free negroes in streets, etc., both on Sundays and other days, was held a valid exercise of the power to prevent and abate a nuisance. Washington Comrs. v. Frank, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 436, 440.

In Washington Comrs. v. Frank, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 436, 440, it is stated that the commissioners of every incorporated town have a right to establish any and every regulation which in their judgment is needful to the comfort of the citizens; and therefore an ordinance which has for its object the prevention of noise and disorder in the public places of the town is a valid exercise of the power vested in such authorities.

So, the collecting in the streets of a city of large numbers of people by reason of loud and indecent language addressed to those passing and repassing on such streets is a nuisance which may be dealt with by the public authorities. Barker v. Com. 19 Pa. 412.

And a continuous or daily beating of drums on the streets of a city will amount to an intolerable nuisance, endangering the safety of teams and the occupants of vehicles drawn by animals, as well as of pedestrians liable to be injured by runaways, and stunning the ears with din so constant as to be almost insufferable, and as such may be abated by the public authorities, but there is usually no objection to such noises on a few special occasions. Re Flaherty, 105 Cal. 558, 561, 27 L. E. A. 523.

Again, a state statute prohibiting the beating of a drum in any town except by command of a military officer is valid, and the fact that the act is done in the performance of a religious service in accordance with a religious belief is no defense, even though there is no actual disturbance of the peace. State v. White, 64 N. H. 48.

But the beating of a drum and the blowing of a fife upon the public streets do not per se constitute a nuisance, and to render such an act a public nuisance it must be so inconvenient and troublesome as to annoy the whole community. State v. Hughes, 72 N. C. 25, 27; State v. Baldwin, 13 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. L.) 197.

A town ordinance which forbids loud and boisterous cursing and swearing in a street, house, or elsewhere in the city is valid, not upon the ground that such conduct amounts to a nuisance which would be punishable under the state's jurisdiction, but upon the ground that it is disorderly conduct. State v. Caiman, 94 N. C. 880, and State v. Debnam, 98 N. C. 712.

So, police regulations respecting the use of the streets by itinerant musicians have been enforced, the provisions applying against a member of the Salvation Army who was playing upon a cornet although he did not make any actual disturbance. Com. v. Plaisted, 143 Mass. 375, 2 L. R. A. 142.

The regulations made by the park commissioners with reference to the holding of public meetings and the making of orations or loud outcries therein are valid, and within the powers of the commissioners, under Mass. Stat. 1875, chap. 85, § 3, which gives them power to govern and regulate the parks, and to make rules for the use and government thereof, the purpose being for the preservation of the public peace and to protect the public grounds from injury. Com. v. Abrahams, 156 Mass. 57.

So, an ordinance of the city of Boston, which prohibits any person, except with the permission of Even where the authority to declare what shall be considered nuisances is conferred upon a city council by the charter in express terms, the power to declare a structure a nuisance the committee of the city council, from delivering a sermon, lecture, address, or discourse on the common or other public ground of the city, has been upheld as being passed for the purpose of preventing nuisances in preserving the public peace. Com. v. Davis, 140 Mass. 485.

Under § 2840, Ohio Rev. Stat., giving the city council the care, supervision, and control of all public highways, etc., within the corporation, and imposing upon them the duty of keeping the same open and in repair and free from nuisances, the court held that the word "nuisance" as therein used did not include an assemblage of persons engaged in an unlawful act, but referred to something which was in a sense fixed or permanent, as a defect in a street. Robinson v. Greenville, 42 Ohio St. 625, 630, 51 Am. Rep. 857. In this case it was sought to make the corporation liable for the firing of a cannon by disorderly people in the public streets, upon the ground that the corporation had not abated or restrained the congregation of such assemblages as nuisances as by the powers conferred upon them by the statute.

The validity of ordinances relating to street parades will be found considered in note to Re Garra-bad (Wis.) 19 L. R. A. 858.

b. Animals running at large.

In the principal case, HAGERSTOWN v. WITMER (Md.) ante. 647, an ordinance providing for the summary destruction of all dogs found running at large on the public streets was upheld as within the powers possessed by municipal corporations, and as constitutional, even though it provided for the killing of such animals, if not ransomed, as therein provided, the charter giving the authorities power to pass all ordinances necessary for the good government of the town, to prevent, remove, and abate all nuisances and obstructions in or upon the streets.

Ordinances passed restraining and prohibiting animals running at large in the streets of cities have been held constitutional as a valid exercise of the police power, although in many cases they have not been specifically declared nuisances, neither have the ordinances declared them to be such. Such would seem to be the case of Burdett v. Allen, 35 W. Va. 347, 14 L. R. A. 387, and many other cases in the same line, but it is not proposed to deal with them in the present note, which is confined to the consideration of municipal control over them as nuisances.

In Petersburg v. Whinnack, 48 Ill. App. 663, the city ordinance declared it unlawful for any horse or other animals to be at large in the city, and prescribed a penalty against the owner or possessor of such animal knowingly suffering or permitting it to go at large, or in any way permitting such animal to graze on the streets or alleys of the city. It was held that, in order to show a violation of the ordinance, it was not necessary to show an intentional suffering or permitting of such animals to be at large, and that the ordinance was violated when a grazing in the street was permitted, although a mere incidental and trifling act of grazing would not be sufficient, as there must be something substantial, and it must be permitted, notwithstanding the fact that it was not necessary to show a design or intention, a permission being sufficient. In this case, however, the act was not specifically declared to be a nuisance.

Stock running at large in the public streets of a city is a nuisance which may be abated by a summary proceeding under a city ordinance passed pursuant to its charter, the same being absolutely necessary to protect the public in the use of the highways. Folmar v. Curtis, 86 Ala. 354.

There must, however, be some guilty intent or wilful neglect before a party can be made liable to the penalties imposed by an ordinance impounding animals found running at large; there must be a permission or suffering of such animals to run at large. Kinder v. Gillespie, 63 Ill. 88; Case v. Hall, 21 Ill. 632, to the same effect.

In Kelley v. Milwaukee, 18 Wis. 83, 86, it is said that hogs or other animals running at large are not necessarily a nuisance in the legal sense of the term, although they are subject to such regulations as the municipal authorities may determine, and the annoyance from them may become so great that they may be declared nuisances.

Yet hogs running at large contrary to lawful prohibition are regarded in the light of a nuisance. Gosselink v. Campbell, 4 Iowa, 296, 301.

So, the running at large of hogs in a town may be regarded as a public nuisance, therefore a city by-law which provides for the abatement of the same is valid. McKee v. McKee, 8 B. Mun. 433.

The right of regulating the use of streets by droves of cattle is within the power of the common council or other local authorities, independently of statute, upon general principles, they being considered nuisances. Metropolitan Bd. of Health v. Heister, 37 N. Y. 661.

And the legislature has power to vest the trustees of the town with power to pass by-laws to prevent hogs running at large in the town, and to abate the same as a nuisance. McKee v. McKee, 8 B. Mun. 433.

And therefore an ordinance relating to the running at large of hogs in the streets of a town as a nuisance will be upheld. Whitfield v. Longest, 23 N. C. (6 Ired. L.) 268.

Under a charter giving power to pass all necessary rules, regulations, and ordinances as deemed advisable with respect to animals at large in the city streets, and to remove nuisances, and to pass all laws and ordinances necessary for the peace, good order, etc., of the city, a city has power to pass an ordinance impounding animals running at large within the corporate limits. Cartersville v. Lanham, 67 Ga. 753.

In Fort Smith v. Dodson, 46 Ark. 296, 298, 299, 35 Am. Rep. 589, an ordinance passed under the general powers given to cities and towns by § 757 of Mansfield's Digest, which ordinance prohibited the running at large of hogs and other animals in the city limits, and established a pound, and authorized the city marshal or policeman to seize and impound such animals, and gave a fee for the service performed in impounding, feeding, and caring for the same, and made it a duty of the marshal to sell them after five days' notice by posters in the city, the proceeds, after defraying expenses, to go to the owner of such animal, was upheld as a valid exercise of the police power, as animals which is not such at common law or has not been declared such by statute, is denied, and the question whether an act upon a highway constitutes a nuisance is one of fact.

Burnham v. Hotchkiss, 14 Conn. 318; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. p. 454.

It has been held that a wooden awning over a sidewalk in front of a store is not per se a nuisance.

Hawkins v. Sanders, 45 Mich. 491. See also Baltimore v. Redecke, 49 Md. 217, 33 Am. Rep.

running at large contrary to lawful prohibition are regarded as nuisances.

And, under a city charter giving the municipal authorities power to adopt ordinances, and conferring not only a general authority to declare, prevent, and remove nuisances, but also express power to prevent stock of any kind from running at large in the public streets and alleys of the city, an ordinance so passed is a valid exercise of the police power and violates no constitutional principle, and the exercise of such power, being a summary proceeding, is absolutely necessary to protect the public use of the highways, — especially where the owner will not take suitable means to prevent his own animals from running at large in the streets. Folmar v. Curtis, 86 Ala. 354.

Again, a city ordinance declaring swine running at large within the corporate limits to be a nuisance, and providing for the abatement thereof will be upheld, even though the defendant set up a right of common under the laws of the state, as, even admitting the right of common, it is not such a right as that it is not within the legislative control, and it may therefore be abridged or destroyed wherever and whenever the law-making power thinks the public good requires it. Roberts v. Ogle, 30 Ill. 459, 461, 83 Am. Dec. 201.

And again, a city ordinance which declares the running at large of cattle, horses, mules, goats, and sheep within the corporate limits a nuisance, and imposes a fine for each violation of the same, will be upheld where the provisions of the city charter confer authority upon the city to abate and remove all nuisances. Quincy v. O'Brien, 24 Ill. App. 561.

So, a town ordinance especially authorizing the impounding of hogs running at large is valid as preserving the health, cleanliness, and safety of the city, such running at large of hogs properly constituting a nuisance under such ordinance, even though such hogs are owned by one not a resident of the city, and have merely strayed into the city limits. Gosselink v. Campbell, 4 Iowa, 296, 301.

In Cochrane v. Frostburg, 81 Md. 54, 27 L. R. A. 723, under article 2, § 144, Md. Code Pub. Local Laws, the mayor and city council have authority to pass such ordinances not contrary to law as they may deem beneficial to the town, and such authority gives them power to remove nuisances and obstructions from the streets, lanes, alleys, and also to ordain and enforce ordinances necessary to preserve the peace, good order, health, and safety of the town, and therefore they have power to prevent animals from running at large upon the streets of the city, the same being a nuisance.

And a city has authority under a power to make all necessary by-laws not repugnant to the laws of the commonwealth, to make and pass by-laws prohibiting cows and other animals going at large, or stopping to feed in streets and highways of the city, such authority not depending upon Mass. Stat. 1867, chap. 82. Com. v. Bean, 14 Gray, 52.

Again, an ordinance which prohibits any person from permitting any horse, cattle, swine, or sheep under his care to go upon any sidewalk in the street, or otherwise occupy, obstruct, injure, or encumber any such sidewalk so as to interfere with the convenient use of the same by all passengers, comes within the provisions of the city charter, which authorized the council to make all such salutary and needful by-laws as towns, by the laws of the commonwealth, have power to make, and such ordinance is therefore valid. Com. v. Curtis, 9 Allen, 286.

These last two cases, however, do not show that the act of allowing cattle to run at large on the streets was expressly declared a nuisance, but they are in line with other cases wherein such acts have been so expressly declared.

Under an act which gives the city authorities power to make ordinances for the removal of public nuisances, and also such necessary rules as may tend to the advantage, improvement, and good government of the town, not inconsistent with the laws and Constitution of the state, if the commissioners deem it to the advantage of the town to prohibit the hogs of citizens from running at large within the corporate limits, such authorities may pass any reasonable by-laws to effect that end; and therefore a law which prohibits such running at large and provides for the seizure of such animals in such cases, and for the advertising of the sale thereof, and enables the owner to redeem the same by paying all charges, and in case of sale provides that the money, after deducting the expenses, shall be paid over to the owner, is reasonable and will be upheld. Hellen v. Noe, 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 493, 499.

In Hellen v. Noe, 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 493, 499, the court drew a distinction between that case and the prior case of Shaw v. Kennedy, 4 N. C. (Taylor's N. C. Term Rep. 591), 158, and infra, upon the ground that in the latter case the ordinance authorized the taking of private property without notice to the owner, or trial of his right, while in the case then before the court the ordinance did not attempt to deprive the owner of his property but provided for his having notice, and secured to him every right which he could claim by allowing him to redeem his property, and the court therefore in that case upheld the ordinance which prohibited hogs running at large.

So, in Crosby v. Warren, 1 Rich. L. 385, an ordinance declaring it to be unlawful for hogs to run at large in the streets, requiring the marshal to seize and impound them, and, after giving two days' public notice, calling on the owners to prove property, to sell them unless the owners pay certain fines fixed by the ordinance, was upheld as being within the powers conferred by the charter to abate and suppress nuisances within the city limits.

The powers granted to municipal authorities by the provisions of the South Carolina statutes incorporating a town are a sufficient authority to enable such authorities to make any public regulations which in their judgment may be necessary to prevent nuisances, by restraining hogs and goats from running at large, the accumulation of filth, and the butchering of hogs or cattle within the town. Kennedy v. Sowden, 1 McMull. L. 323, 326.

Under the 3d section of the act under which Memphis is created a taxing district, it has power by ordinance to provide for the impounding of animals running at large in the streets of the city, the same being considered in the light of a nuisance. Moore v. State, 11 Lea, 35.

Again, an ordinance for the removal of the nuisance of hogs from streets, alleys, and other places within a city is within the provisions of the Texas act of January 27, 1858, Paschal's Digest, art. 5263, which gives a board of aldermen control over the streets and public places of a town, with power to prevent any nuisances within the limits of the corporation, and cause them to be removed at the expense of the person causing them. Waco v. Powell, 32 Tex. 258.

So, a city ordinance which provides for the impounding of animals found running at large on the streets, and for the sale thereof without any judicial inquiry or determination, is not unconstitutional as authorizing a forfeiture of property without due process of law, although under such charter and ordinance the penalty imposed upon the owner cannot be made a charge upon such animals when impounded, nor can such penalty be made payable out of the proceeds of the sale. Wilcox v. Hemming, 58 Wis. 144, 46 Am. Rep. 675.

And in Grover v. Huckins, 26 Mich. 476, an ordinance relating to the restraining and impounding of animals running at large was upheld, although in that case they were not specifically declared to be nuisances.

And again, in Whitlock v. West, 26 Conn. 408, the town's right to pass by-laws impounding cattle found at large in the public streets was upheld as within the power conferred by § 30 of title 8 of the Connecticut statutes.

And the same was the holding of the court in Gilchrist v. Schmidling, 12 Kan. 263, where the ordinance of a city of the second class authorized the impounding of animals found at large in the streets of the city between sunset and sunrise, the same being within the provisions of Kan. Stat. 1872, relating to second-class cities.

So, in Moore v. State, 11 Lea, 35, the court upheld an ordinance providing for the impounding of animals running at large in the city streets under the section of an act giving power to the taxing district to define, prevent, and remove nuisances.

And, in Campau v. Langley, 39 Mich. 451, 39 Am. Rep. 414, an ordinance relating to animals running at large, providing for their seizure and sale and for payment of the expenses thereof out of the proceeds of such sale, the balance to be handed over to the owner of the animal, who was to have time to redeem same before sale, was upheld as constitutional, although such animals were not specifically declared to be a nuisance.

In Marietta v. Fearing, 4 Ohio, 427, 431, it was held that straying animals owned by nonresident persons could not be subjected to the provisions of ordinances passed by incorporated towns declaring the same nuisances.

But the cattle of a stranger, straying into a town and there becoming nuisances, may be removed by way of abating the nuisance, and may be distrained and impounded until the owner shall pay the expense. Whitfield v. Longest, 28 N. C. (6 Ired. L.) 268; Plymouth Comrs. v. Pettijohn, 15 N. C. (4 Dev. L.) 591.

So, a town ordinance, declaring and prohibiting the running at large of hogs in the town as a nuisance, and directing that such animals so found running at large shall be taken up by the police constable and placed in a pound, will apply where the hogs of one residing half a mile without the limits of the town are found running at large within the town and are impounded, such impounding being lawfully within the provisions of the ordinance. Friday v. Floyd, 63 Ill. 50.

And an ordinance passed under the provisions of the act of incorporation to prevent or abate all nuisances on public or private property, declaring hogs running at large within the corporate limits to be nuisances, requiring the marshal to seize the same, and inflicting a penalty upon the owner upon having the same restored to him, is valid, and applies to a case wherein the owner of the animal resides outside of the city limits, although it is not designed to punish people for the inevitable escape where they use requisite diligence to reclaim the animals and regain their possession. Spitler v. Young, 63 Mo. 42, 45.

Again, under an act incorporating a village, giving the authorities power to make rules, by-laws, and ordinances respecting the streets and ways for the security, welfare, and convenience of the village, and for preserving the health, and also to abate and remove nuisances within its limits, the town council have power to declare hogs running at large in the streets nuisances, no matter whether they belong to residents or nonresidents, and their seizure by the party authorized under such ordinance is valid. Crosby v. Warren, 1 Rich. L. 365.

And, again, under a city charter giving power to the corporation to enact and pass laws and ordinances necessary to preserve the health of the town, and to prevent and remove nuisances, the authorities have power to pass an ordinance impounding stock of a nonresident found running at large in the streets of a city, and to sell the same after notice by publication. Knoxville v. King, 7 Lea, 441.

But where the statutory provisions pertaining to the question give the board of trustees power to declare what shall constitute a nuisance, and to prevent, abate, and remove the same, and take such measures for the preservation of the public health as they shall deem necessary, and also to restrain from running at large cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals, a town, incorporated under the general laws of the state, has no power to provide by ordinance for the impounding and sale of animals found at large in the streets and other public places within such town, and under the provisions of such statute such ordinance cannot be maintained. Slessman v. Crozier, 80 Ind. 457.

And a city ordinance authorizing a constable to seize all hogs running at large in a city as nuisances is void, for the reason that it authorizes the taking of private property without a hearing. Shaw v. Kennedy, 4 N. C. (Taylor's N. C. Term Rep. 591) 158.

In answer to the contention of the city authorities in the case of Shaw v. Kennedy, 4 N. C. (Taylor's N. C. Term Rep. 591) 158, that hogs in a town were a nuisance, the court stated that the authorities which proved hogs a nuisance spoke of them as in a sty or pen which necessarily produces a stench and consequently an inconvenience to the neighboring public.

In that case, however, there was a dissenting opinion to the effect that the running at large of

By-laws are usually more inartificially expressed than other laws, and are entitled to a reasonable construction.

Whitlock v. West, 26 Conn. 414.

That footways are the subject of municipal control cannot be questioned.

Livingston v. Wolf, 136 Pa. 519; Pedrick v. Bailey, 12 Gray. 163; Goddard, Petitioner, 16

hogs in the streets of a town are within the definition of the term "nuisance," and cause a nuisance as much as many acts which have been decided to be nuisances, as all the inconveniences produced by them show that, upon principles of common law and common sense, they answer the definition of a nuisance.

Under the provisions of a city charter giving the trustees power to enact ordinances and by-laws providing for the good health, order, comfort of the people, and the safety of property, and for the abatement or prevention of nuisances, and for the public good, an ordinance making it unlawful for hogs to run at large in the city streets, fining the owner and making it the duty of the city marshal to seize, advertise, and offer them for sale, and after paying the expenses hand the balance to the owner of such hogs, is not authorized, inasmuch as the right to adjudge the forfeiture of such animals running at large without notice is not plainly conferred by the charter. Varden v. Mount, 78 Ky. 86, 39 Am. Rep. 238.

So, an ordinance making it the duty of the marshal to cause hogs let loose or running at large in the streets of a city to be taken up and impounded and sold within thirty days, having first caused the sale to be proclaimed by hand bills through the city, is invalid, no notice to the owner being provided for, although the provisions of the city charter give the authorities power to require and compel the abatement and removal of all nuisances within the city limits under such regulations as they may prescribe by ordinance. Rosebaugh v. Saffin, 10 Ohio, 31.

And under the general laws of the state containing no prohibition against swine, cattle, horses, or other animals running at large, but defining the duties of persons taking up stray animals, and enacting that no person shall be allowed to take up any neat cattle, sheep, or hogs between certain dates annually, a city ordinance which prohibits such animals from running at large cannot be enforced, even though the act of incorporation gives the authorities power to make such by-laws and ordinances, consistent with the Constitution and laws of the state, as they shall deem necessary for the regulation, interest, health, cleanliness, convenience, and advantage of the inhabitants, and also to require and compel the abatement of nuisances. Collins v. Hatch, 18 Ohio, 523, 525, 51 Am. Dec. 465.

In Rosebaugh v. Saffin, 10 Ohio, 31, 35, exception was taken to a city ordinance relating to the question of animals running at large in the streets, and making it the duty of the marshal to seize and impound the same, and to sell them and to pay the money realized into the city treasury after deducting expenses. The city charter by § 12 authorized the abatement of nuisances, and § 13 gave power to prohibit all hogs, etc., from running at large; and the court stated that if such last section had been omitted there would be reason to hold that it was intended to embrace the evil complained of under the head of nuisances, but § 13 absolutely excluded such inference, as it precisely and definitely withdrew the mischief complained of from the head of nuisances and the matter was therefore disposed of under the 13th section of the act.

In Johnson v. Daw, 53 Mo. App. 372, 374, the action was in replevin by the owner of certain horses, 39 L. R. A.

and the defendant justified his detention by showing that, as marshal of the town, he found them running at large upon the streets contrary to the terms of the ordinance, and thereupon impounded them under the provision thereof. It was attempted to sustain the ordinance under the charter provision as to the prevention and removal of nuisances, but the court stated that this could not be done in the light of the fact that special provision was made in terms concerning animals running at large, and that in such a case it was proper to look to the terms of such special provision for the power asserted, but that if the regulation of animals running at large had not been specially provided for, the power might be looked for under the nuisance provision, the court citing and relying upon Rosebaugh v. Saffin, 10 Ohio, 32.

So, an ordinance regulating the keeping of dogs was said to be within the police powers, in Faribault v. Wilson, 34 Minn. 254, for the reason that from their nature they are liable to become nuisances. The following cases are to the same effect: Blair v. Forehand, 100 Mass. 136, 1 Am. Rep. 94; Morey v. Brown, 42 N. H. 373; Mitchell v. Williams, 27 Ind. 62; Carter v. Dow, 16 Wis. 299; Tenney v. Lenz, 16 Wis. 566; Ex parte Cooper, 3 Tex. App. 490, 30 Am. Rep. 152.

Under a charter giving power to declare what shall constitute a nuisance, and to prevent, abate, and remove the same, an ordinance providing for the muzzling of dogs or for the keeping of the same upon the owner's own premises, and authorizing the killing of such as are found at large, was held valid in Haller v. Sheridan, 27 Ind. 494.

In Leech v. Elwood, 3 Ill. App. 453, 457, an ordinance giving the city authorities power to kill dogs running at large in the public streets, passed pursuant to a charter giving power to abate nuisances, was upheld as constitutional, the court stating that the owner of such an animal could be compelled to keep it in such a manner as not to endanger the rights of others, and that if the animal was running at large in violation of the ordinance after having been declared a nuisance by being allowed to do so, the city authorities had the right to abate the nuisance, and the fact that the most effectual way of accomplishing this purpose was taken, cannot, upon principle or reason, be considered an unauthorized proceeding.

As to liability for permitting animals on streets, see note to Cochrane v. Frostburg (Md.) 27 L. R. A. 728.

And upon the question of the right to kill dogs, see note to Hubbard v. Preston (Mich.) 15 L. R. A. 249.

The question of nuisances relating to the keeping of animals will be found treated of in note to Harrington v. Providence (R. I.) 38 L. R. A. 305.

c. Vehicles.

Regulations regarding the use of streets by public carriages, such as omnibuses, made by a corporation as a means of regulating the use of the streets, are valid matters of public safety and convenience, and tend to prevent nuisances and obstructions upon the streets. *Com. v. An ordinance of a city prohibiting the owner, driver, or other person having the care or ordering of a vehicle, from stopping in the street for more than twenty minutes is a valid police regulation, and the fact that the defendant has a license from the state as a hawker and peddler is immaterial, such license not authorizing him to violate the ordinance or police regulation of the city, even though in the prosecution of such business he is not maintaining or creating a nuisance of any kind. Com. v. Fenton, 139 Mass. 186.

The holding of the court in Com. v. Fenton, 139 Mass. 186, with regard to the city ordinance regulating the stopping of vehicles in the street, was followed and approved in the later case of Com. v. Lagorio, 141 Mass. 81.

In People v. Cunningham, 1 Denio, 524, 43 Am. Dec. 708, the systematic and continuous encroachment upon the street by the defendant in using the same so as to render the passage less convenient, and allowing teams and wagons to collect thereon for purposes connected with his business, constituted a nuisance, the same impeding the free passage of the streets, even though the business carried on by him was lawful, the use of the street in that case not being merely temporary.

The mere fact that the defendant on a certain day stood with his cart and mule near the angle made by two streets, one of which was 90 and the other 66 feet wide, for the space of an hour and a half, during which time there was the usual passing of vehicles and foot passengers every way up and down the streets, does not constitute the act a nuisance per se, within the meaning or provisions of a city ordinance. *State v. In Rex v. Cross, 3 Campb. 226, stage coaches standing and soliciting passengers in the public streets, thereby obstructing the free use thereof by the public, were said to be a nuisance, as the highway cannot be used as a stable yard.

In Chillicothe v. Brown, 88 Mo. App. 609, 616, wherein it was sought to declare a city ordinance regulating omnibuses and other vehicles and porters and runners at railroad depots within the city, which the defendant was charged with violating, unreasonable and invalid, it is stated that railroads are public carriers deriving their power from the state, and their depots are constructed and maintained, not only to facilitate the receipt and discharge of freight and passengers, but for the comfort and convenience of arriving and departing passengers, and of the public generally having business with their station agents, and therefore any exercise of the police power by the state or any political subdivision thereof which imposes upon them and those having business at their depots such regulations as tend to prevent nuisances, and other 89 L. R. A.

Torrance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was prosecuted in the city court of Middletown for the violation of an ordinance of that city, and was convicted. He appealed to the superior court, and there, upon a trial to the jury, was convicted, and judgment annoyances thereat, to the public, are not to be judicially condemned as unreasonable and invalid.

So, an ordinance prohibiting persons from running for or soliciting passengers for steamboats, or other public or private conveyances, or for taverns or boarding houses, or other places of resort, passed pursuant to a charter, was upheld, although the case did not specifically show such acts to be nuisances. Niagara Falls v. Salt, 45 Hun, 41.

In order to transgress an ordinance relating to the stoppage and occupation of a street by wagons and vehicles so as to amount to an obstruction in violation of a city ordinance, it must be shown that the act is done voluntarily before the defendant can be held for violating the ordinance. Com. v. Brooks, 99 Mass. 434.

Upon the question of the power of a municipality to regulate the speed of vehicles on the street, see State v. Sheppard, 64 Minn. 287, 26 L. R. A. 306.

The power of a municipality to license the use of the streets by vehicles will be found discussed in note to Tomlinson v. Indianapolis (Ind.) 36 L. R. A. 418.

d. Selling on streets.

A city ordinance which prohibits the sale, or offering or exposing for sale, at public auction, upon the streets of a city, of goods under a certain penalty, is reasonable, and not in restraint of trade, under the statutes of a state relating to the organization of cities and incorporated villages, giving the city council control of the streets and imposing upon them the duty of keeping the same free from nuisances. White v. Kent, 11 Ohio St. 550, 552, 553.

In Com. v. Ellis, 158 Mass. 555, the court upheld the ordinance of the city of Boston (Rev. Ord. 1892, chap. 43, § 35), relating to selling in the public streets, such ordinance being for the public benefit, as relieving a nuisance in the obstruction to travel and general inconvenience caused by stationary objects in crowded and narrow streets, the mere fact that the defendant had a license as a peddler in the commonwealth not authorizing him to violate the ordinance of the city.

So, in Com. v. Passmore, 1 Serg. & R. 219, the defendant, an auctioneer, sought to justify his obstruction of the public road under the ordinance of the city which imposed a penalty upon persons obstructing the streets with their goods, upon the ground that such ordinance exempted the sale of goods at public auction; but the court stated that although such might be the provisions of the ordinance, yet it could not authorize him to permit the nuisance at common law, and therefore affirmed the decision of the court below which found the defendant guilty of maintaining a nuisance.

The principles settled by the case of Com. v. Passmore, 1 Serg. & R. 219, were followed by the court in Com. v. Milliman, 13 Serg. & R. 403, wherein the court found a constable, who conducted an execution sale in the public street, to be a nuisance in obstructing the same.

The use of the streets for a market place by hucksters selling vegetables and other country produce, attended with loud noises and offensive smells, is a public nuisance, and an unwarranted use of the highway, and is not legalized by a grant from the city officer. McDonald v. Newark, 42 N. J. Eq. 136, 138.

A market in a street is an additional easement to, and in a measure inconsistent with, the ordinary was rendered against him, from which judgment the present appeal is taken.

The complaint charges that the defendant, on the 11th day of March, 1897, within the limits of the city, "did, and for a long time previous thereto has unlawfully erected and maintained an awning over the sidewalk in front of the premises . . . occupied by him, which awning is not upon a suitable frame, and attached entirely to the building so occupied by him as aforesaid, . . . against the peace and contrary to the form of the provisions of the ordinance of said city in such case made and provided." That part of the ordinance upon which this complaint is based reads as follows: "The following acts are declared to use of the highway, and, if unauthorized, is a nuisance. State v. Laverack, 84 N. J. L. 201, 204, 208. In this case the defendant created a nuisance in placing a wagon close to the curb and selling produce therefrom.

An ordinance preventing the keeping of oysters elsewhere than in certain streets in a market is valid, being for the purpose of cleanliness and salubrity, as heaps of oysters have a great tendency to putrefaction. Morano v. New Orleans, 2 La. 217.

c. Sliding in the streets.

Sliding in the street accompanied with boisterous conduct is not necessarily unlawful, nor is it necessarily a public nuisance. Jackson v. Castle, 82 Me. 579, 581, 80 Me. 119.

And the mere averment that sliding on a side street is accompanied with boisterous conduct, contrary to the provisions of the city ordinance and to the common nuisance of the citizens, does not render the act itself a nuisance. Jackson v. Castle, 82 Me. 579, 581, 80 Me. 119.

Where, by an act amending the city charter, a city is empowered to pass ordinances to remove all nuisances and obstructions from the streets, lanes, and alleys within the city limits, and for the preservation of peace and good order, securing persons and property from violence, danger, and destruction, and the city ordinance prohibited any sport, play, or exercise that might produce bodily injury or endanger property on any street, square, or alley within the city limits, the city has power to prohibit by ordinance the practice of coasting upon a street, which ordinance it must enforce by ordinary and reasonable care and diligence. Taylor v. Cumberland, 64 Md. 68, 54 Am. Rep. 759.

f. Sidewalks.

Streets include sidewalks as well as the roadway, and all obstructions of a sidewalk are public nuisances. Ex parte Taylor, 87 Cal. 91, 94; Bonnet v. San Francisco, 65 Cal. 230; Marini v. Graham, 67 Cal. 180.

The obstruction of a sidewalk in a public street is a nuisance, and a common nuisance, and an ordinance of the city, to abate such a nuisance, or to inflict upon the person making it a pecuniary penalty for its existence or continuance, is reasonable and proper and ought to be enforced by the courts. Memphis v. Lenore, 6 Coldw. 412, 415.

A sidewalk opening is not a nuisance per se, and therefore, although municipal authorities may proceed to institute proceedings for the abatement thereof as a common nuisance, yet they cannot declare it to be such, nor make themselves the judges thereof. Everett v. Marquette, 53 Mich. 450, 451.

Yet an area 3 feet wide and 8 feet deep, so near to an alley as to endanger persons passing along the alley, is a public nuisance and abatable as such. Bond v. Smith, 44 Hun. 219, 222.

So, an area opening into a public footway, or so near thereto that a person lawfully using the way with ordinary caution may by accident fall into it, is per se a nuisance, and only ceases to be such when proper means are adopted, thereby inclosing it or maintaining a light to warn persons of danger and guard against the occurrence of such accidents. Temperance Hall Asso. v. Giles, 33 N. J. L. 260, 264; Durant v. Palmer, 29 N. J. L. 544; Barnes v. Ward, 9 C. B. 362, 2 Car. & K. 661, 19 L. J. C. P. N. S. 89 L. R. A.

196, 14 Jur. 384; Hounsell v. Smyth, 7 C. B. N. S. 781, 20 L. J. C. P. N. S. 303, 6 Jur. N. S. 897, 8 Week. Rep. 277; Hardcastle v. South Yorkshire R. & River Dun Co. 4 Hurlst. & N. 67, 28 L. J. Exch. N. S. 136, 5 Jur. N. S. 150, 32 L. T. 297, 7 Week. Rep. 326; Binks v. South Yorkshire R. & River Dun Co. 3 Best & S. 244, 32 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 26, 7 L. T. N. S. 850, 11 Week. Rep. 66; Hadley v. Taylor, L. R. 1 C. P. 63, 11 Jur. N. S. 979, 18 L. T. N. S. 368, 14 Week. Rep. 59.

And an areaway or passage opening into a much-frequented street is properly a public nuisance, when especially dangerous. Beatty v. Gilmore, 16 Pa. 463, 469, 55 Am. Dec. 514.

If an area is left open and unguarded it is dangerous and a public nuisance, and may be abated as such. Chicago v. Robbins, 47 U. S. 2 Black, 418, 424, 17 L. ed. 266, 302; Storrs v. Utica, 17 N. Y. 108, 72 Am. Dec. 487.

In McNerney v. Reading City, 156 Pa. 611-614, an areaway, 4 feet and 9 inches in width, extending from the building line into the street 5 feet and 6 inches, into which persons passing along the sidewalk or to and from the building in the night-time might accidentally fall, without any fault on their part, which way was insufficiently guarded and a dangerous obstruction, was held to be a public nuisance.

The court distinguished the above case of McNerney v. Reading City, 156 Pa. 611, 614, from that of King v. Thompson, 87 Pa. 365, 30 Am. Rep. 364, in which case the opening in front of a cellar window such as was usual and customary in the city for lighting and ventilating the cellar and reasonably necessary for that purpose, was held not to be a nuisance per se, although the opening was about 15 inches in width, 3 feet in length, and projected from the wall of the house about 16 inches, an opening of that description being wholly unlike the opening exhibited by the evidence in the McNerney Case, the court in the case of King v. Thompson, stating that it was "really difficult to see how the plaintiff succeeded in getting into the hole."

In Memphis v. Lenore, 6 Coldw. 412, 415, permission had been granted the defendant to make an entrance to the basement or cellar of his house by a descending stairway extending out from the wall of the house, 5 feet in width, upon the public sidewalk. It was held that, notwithstanding such permission, the city authorities had power by ordinance to cause the removal of such entrance or stairway as an obstruction and a public nuisance to the streets, and that the use and possession thereof being by permission was not adverse, and therefore gave the defendant no right by prescription or lapse of time.

Where the obstruction of the sidewalk was in the first instance erected under the permission of the city authorities, it was held that such an obstruction did not become a public common nuisance until after the permission was revoked and notice given to the defendant of the revocation and his failure to remove it, after which notice and failure the city was entitled to abate and remove it by the police power. Memphis v. Lenore, 6 Coldw. 412, 415.

So, in Reading v. Reiner, 167 Pa. 41, the city was allowed to recover the damages it had been compelled to pay by reason of the defendant's negligence in maintaining an unguarded areaway in the side-be acts of nuisance of the first class: . . . The erection or maintaining any awning, except the same be upon a suitable frame, and attached entirely to the building, which awning shall not, when extended, be less than 6 feet from the sidewalk." The facts in the case,—and they were really undisputed on the trial,—are these: On the date alleged in the complaint, and for a long time prior thereto, the defendant maintained an awning over the sidewalk in front of his store, "which awning rolled up and down upon a wooden frame, which was attached to the building and extended across the sidewalk, to wooden posts set near the curbstone, which posts furnished the support for the outer side of the frame." The awning was not walk in such a way as to become an obstruction to the street and a public nuisance, the areaway in question being the same as that set forth in McNerney v. Reading City, 150 Pa. 611.

An excavation made in a sidewalk, and stairs erected without the permission of the public authorities, make the persons occasioning such excavation, whereby an injury is sustained for which the public authorities have been compelled to make compensation, the author of a nuisance in the street, and liable to the public authorities for the damages occasioned. McNaughton v. Elkhart, 85 Ind. 864, 887.

In Com. v. Summerrott, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 1, it was sought to restrain the defendant in his encroachment upon the street by means of a bay window built from the ground to the top of the house which projected 4 feet, and which was alleged to be a public nuisance. The court held that as there were many such windows it was a serious matter to decide that in every instance the simple fact of a second-story window extending over the building line may be a public nuisance, liable to removal without regard to circumstances, and that every such case ought to depend upon its own peculiar circumstances, but the court granted an injunction restraining the defendant from continuing the maintenance of the first-story of the said bay window, and directed the removal of the same.

A legalized obstruction of a sidewalk is not a nuisance. Ex parte Taylor, 87 Cal. 91, 94; Marini v. Graham, 87 Cal. 180.

Although a city may give permission to do lawful and necessary work in the excavation of a sidewalk for building purposes and any other matters relating thereto, yet such permission will not authorize the creation of a nuisance. Fort Wayne v. DeWitt, 47 Ind. 391, 397. Chicago v. Robbins, 87 U. S. 2 Black, 418, 17 L. ed. 298, to the same effect.

As to excavations in general, see supra, I.

And although an act may legalize erections or obstructions upon a sidewalk which are nuisances, yet it is no more than a mere license for their continuance, and may be revoked at the pleasure of the legislature or public authorities. Reading v. Com. 11 Pa. 193, 201, 51 Am. Dec. 584.

The authority given by a municipal corporation to partially obstruct a sidewalk, and so create what would otherwise be a public nuisance, may be revoked by a change in the ordinance, and such obstruction would then become a public nuisance rendering the party continuing its use after such revocation amenable to the law. Ex parte Taylor, 87 Cal. 91, 94.

The above case was followed by the court in the latter case of Ex parte Rinaldo (Cal.) 25 Pac. 260, which was precisely similar in its nature.

In Palmyra v. Morton, 25 Mo. 598, 599, it is said that the rights of municipal corporations to require the owner to pave the sidewalk in front of his property may be derived from its duty to protect the public health and to prevent nuisances, and is a mere police regulation.

Where a landowner put in curb stones, and laid a pavement which projected into the highway of an unincorporated town in front of his house and lot, and planted trees and put in hitching posts along the outside edge of the pavement, it was held that he did not create a public nuisance in so 39 L. R. A.

doing, the same not being an unreasonable obstruction of the highway, the right to construct sidewalks in an unincorporated village being distinctly recognized by the Pennsylvania act of April 6, 1868. Com. v. Hauck, 108 Pa. 536, 537.

Whatever interferes unreasonably and unnecessarily with the use of the public streets by the public themselves is a nuisance which a city council may well prohibit by ordinance, and individuals have no right to appropriate the sidewalks to the use of their own trade or business in such a manner as to interfere with their public use, although there may be cases of necessity, as in the erection of buildings, when partial or temporary obstructions of sidewalks may be justified. White v. Kent, 11 Ohio St. 550, 552. Clark v. Fry, 8 Ohio St. 358, 72 Am. Dec. 590, to the same effect.

In State v. Summerfield, 107 N. C. 895, 899, an ordinance which prohibited produce, merchandise, cooked provisions, poultry, fruits, vegetables, or other commodity from being kept exposed for sale in or upon any sidewalk, the space in front of buildings used as sidewalks, alley, gutter, or ereet of the town, and the placing of any stand thereon for any such purpose, and also the exposure of any such articles thereon, or in the space in front of any building in such manner as to be in the way of persons traveling the same, was upheld as valid, for the reason that such articles might, in the opinion of the commissioners based upon reasonable grounds, endanger the health of the citizens of the town or incommode them in passing by a way left open for them by the owner, or might frighten horses attached to vehicles driven along the street, which circumstances would be sufficient to warrant the enactment under the general authorities to prohibit nuisances, protect health, and prevent individuals from so using their own property as to subject others to serious or unnecessary inconvenience or danger.

As to stands, show-cases, and other such erections on sidewalks, etc., see supra, III. b; and as to things overhanging streets and sidewalks, see supra, III. e.

g. Gas pipes.

In Butler v. Butler Gas Co. (Pa.) 5 Cent. Rep. 609, it is held that a municipality cannot sustain a bill for perpetual injunction against a natural gas fuel company reincorporated under the Pennsylvania act of May 29, 1885, on the ground that the corporation has laid its pipes in the borough without permission, and that such pipes are defective, and cause injury to the property and persons of citizens,—especially where the averments of the bill are denied, and the court, upon examination, finds that the matter complained of is not a public nuisance.

An ordinance prohibiting a gas company from laying its gas mains in the public streets in the winter months was held reasonable and not in restraint of trade as being passed for the purpose of preventing obstruction in the streets and nuisances. Northern Liberties Comrs. v. Northern Liberties Gas Co. 12 Pa. 318.

h. Convict labor on the streets.

A city ordinance which declared the working of convicts upon the streets of the city to be a nuisance as calculated to produce riots, endanger the lives of the inhabitants, and to disturb the peace permanently attached to this frame, but "was at one end attached to a 2 x 4 scantling, which was nailed to the building, and at the other end was attached to a wooden roller, which rolled out upon the frame above described when the awning was extended, and which was drawn up to the building by means of ropes, thus rolling up the awning upon it when the awning was not needed as a shade. . . . No part of the frame, unless the posts aforesaid be considered a part of it, was within 6 feet of the sidewalk." These posts, "in addition to supporting the frame, were used as hitching posts for horses," and the frame and posts "had existed in the same condition for many years. . . . No evidence was offered by the state to show that and good order of the city, is invalid, in so far as it declared such act to be a nuisance, and therefore equity will not enjoin such working. Ward v. Little Rock, 41 Ark. 528, 48 Am. Rep. 46, 47.

1. Betting on streets.

The power conferred upon municipalities by the English corporation act of 1862, to make by-laws for the good rule and government of the borough, and for the prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable by any act in force, empowers such municipalities to prohibit, by a by-law, any person using or frequenting the street for the purpose of bookmaking or betting. Burnett v. Berry [1896] 1 Q. B. 641.

V. Water, watercourses, etc.

Public streams are governed by the same general rules of law as are highways upon land. Gerrish v. Brown, 51 Me. 236, 262, 268, 81 Am. Dec. 569.

Great water highways belong to the same class of public rights, and are governed by the same general rules, applicable to highways upon land, and any contracting or narrowing of a public highway on land is a nuisance, and all unauthorized intrusions upon a water highway for purposes unconnected with the right of navigation or passage are nuisances. People v. Gold Run Ditch & Min. Co. 66 Cal. 138-147, 56 Am. Rep. 80. To the same effect, Republica v. Caldwell, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 150, 1 L. ed. 77; Com. v. King, 18 Met. 115.

Highways, whether on land or water, are designated for the accommodation of the public for travel or transportation. They cannot be made the receptacles of waste materials, filth, or trash, nor the depositories of even valuable property, so as to obstruct their use as public highways, and therefore, if any person obstructs a stream which is by law a public highway by casting therein waste materials, or filth, or trash, or by depositing materials of any description except as connected with the reasonable use of such stream as a highway, or by direct authority of the law, he does it at his peril as it is a public nuisance. People v. Gold Run Ditch & Min. Co. 66 Cal. 138, 147, 56 Am. Rep. 80; Veazie v. Dwinel, 50 Me. 479; Gerrish v. Brown, 51 Me. 236, 262, 81 Am. Dec. 569.

In Com. v. Wright, Thacher, Crim. Cas. 217, it is said that as the common highways on the land are for the common land passage, so rivers, whether fresh or salt, are for common passage, and ports and harbors are highways by water, and if a person intrudes upon the property of the public it is a purpresture, and the people or the proper officer of the government may enter upon the same and repossess themselves of it, the remedy being civil in its nature; but that any intrusion into, or an occupation of, the public highway which straitens or incommodates the public in the enjoyment of a public right, as that of passing, is a common nuisance.

In this case, however, the defendants were prosecuted at the instance of the commonwealth, the object of the indictment being to preserve the safety of the harbor and to protect the public in the enjoyment of what they were entitled to, namely, a free and unobstructed navigation of the river.

It has been said that any illegal encroachment upon a public stream is a purpresture, that is, the making of that private which ought to be common to many, and an obstruction in a public river is a 39 L. R. A. nuisance which may be dealt with as such. People v. Vanderbilt, 38 Barb. 232, 238, 294.

Obstructions to navigation are public nuisances. Allen v. Monmouth County Freeholders, 13 N. J. Eq. 68, 73.

An unlawful obstruction that impedes the free use of a navigable river for the purposes of navigation is a public nuisance. New York v. Baumberger, 7 Robt. 219, 220.

It is a public nuisance to obstruct the navigation of a public navigable river without authority of law. Renwick v. Morris, 7 Hill, 575.

A bridge constructed over a river with proper draws, in a manner calculated to injure navigation as little as possible, is not a nuisance, and therefore any slight unavoidable obstruction which such a bridge occasions must be borne as a necessary evil for the public good. Thompson v. Paterson & H. R. R. Co. 9 Eq. N. J. 628.

In Newark Pl. Road & Ferry Co. v. Elmer, Van Wagenen, 9 N. J. Eq. 754, 788, it is said that every wharf, pier, or bridge is not necessarily a nuisance for the reason that instead of injuring it might in some cases benefit the navigation of a navigable river, but every erection in a navigable river which obstructs or hinders the navigation is a nuisance, for the fact that it does obstruct or hinder the free navigation to which the public is entitled is precisely what makes it a nuisance ad commune nocumtum.

Without a grant of authority every obstruction in a navigable river will be a nuisance, and no evidence need be given of the extent to which the public right is impaired, or the public use of the river impeded; it is sufficient that the public domain which is devoted to a public use is invaded in a way to deprive the public of any part of it. People v. Vanderbilt, 38 Barb. 232, 238.

If a pier be erected in a navigable river without lawful authority, it is a nuisance per se, and no evidence is admissible to show that, though illegal, it will do no harm, and such an obstruction needs no evidence to prove it a nuisance per se as a matter of fact after the erection has been shown to be in violation of law. People v. Vanderbilt, 38 Barb. 232, 238.

✦ An unauthorized invasion of the rights of the public to navigate the water of navigable streams flowing over the soil is a public nuisance. People v. Gold Run Ditch & Min. Co. 66 Cal. 138, 147, 56 Am. Rep. 80.

Although the inhabitants of a town may be empowered to make a bridge according to the location of county commissioners, yet any excess or irregularity in the exercise of such a power by which navigation becomes obstructed becomes pro tanto a public nuisance. State v. Freeport, 43 Me. 198, 201.

Where the act gave the defendant company the right to erect its road beyond the banks of the river in a manner which would not prevent the free and uninterrupted navigation of the same, and the plan selected by such company showed that the work would obstruct navigation in a manner beyond what was reasonably necessary for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act, it was held that the works so constructed amounted to a public nuisance and were restrainable as such. Newark Pl. Road & Ferry Co. v. Elmer, Van Wagenen, 9 N. J. Eq. 754, 788.

the said awning or frame had ever in any way interfered with the health, safety, comfort, or convenience of the public at large, or that the awning or said frame was on the day in question a nuisance in fact, or had ever been so."

Upon this state of facts, the defendant requested the court, among other things, to instruct the jury in substance as follows: (1) That the ordinance in question was invalid and void for uncertainty and ambiguity. (2) That it was invalid and void for uncertainty, "because the word 'suitable' has no definite and determined meaning in the connection in which it is placed, and the defendant could not know that he had done any act which was prohibited by the ordinance." (3) That the charter gave the city no power to pass this ordinance, and that the ordinance itself was unreasonable, un-

In Cox v. State, 3 Blackf. 193, 199, in reference to the government's interest of jurisdiction over navigable streams and waters, it is said that the government's jurisdiction over those streams in reference to nuisances is to reform and punish nuisances in all navigable rivers, whether fresh or salt, and reform all obstructions to the common passage of ships, vessels, barges, or boats therein; for as common highways on the land are of the common land passage, so these rivers, whether fresh or salt, that bear boats, are highways by water.

So, in Gunter v. Geary, 1 Cal. 462, 469, the court stated that it is the duty of municipal authorities as the guardians of the interests of commerce and navigation in a harbor to abate all nuisances, having authority to permit such structures as tend to the benefit thereof. In this case the authorities had appropriated a portion of the harbor for a public slip, and it was held that the mayor and his assistants violated no private rights in removing all structures of any kind which they found obstructing the free use of such slip.

By the law as it stood before the passing of Mass. Stat. 1837, chap. 229, and 1840, chap. 35, any building beyond the line of low-water mark upon navigable tide waters was an encroachment upon the public rights, and if it obstructed navigation it was a public nuisance. Garey v. Ellis, 1 Cush. 306. In that case, however, the action was of a private nature.

Under § 5, Mass. Stat. 1838, chap. 149, all erections and works made without authority from the legislature, or in any manner not sanctioned by the commissioners of harbors, when their direction is required as provided in the statute, within tide waters, flowing into or through any harbor, are to be considered public nuisances, and the prohibition extends to ordinary high-water mark. Atty. Gen. v. Woods, 108 Mass. 438, 440, 11 Am. Rep. 380.

In this case it was sought to restrain the building and rebuilding of a dam across a river to the obstruction of the waters of the river and the enjoyment thereof, to the great injury and common and public nuisance of the citizens at a place alleged to be within the tide waters flowing into the harbor of Boston, which was rightfully used by the citizens for the purpose of navigation. The cases of Com. v. Roxbury, 9 Gray, 451, and Com. v. Charlestown, 1 Pick. 180, 11 Am. Dec. 161, recognize the same principle.

The owner of land at the side of a public navigable river has no right to erect, on the bed of the river for the benefit of his own trade, any structure whether any actual obstruction or nuisance to the navigation of the river will or will not be thereby occasioned, and any benefit to his own trade is too remote to be held for the advantage of the public generally, and so to justify the erection. Atty. Gen. v. Terry, L. R. 9 Ch. 423, 30 L. T. N. S. 215, 22 Week. Rep. 305.

In Bristol v. Morgan, cited in 2 Anstr. 607, and in Lord Hale's treatise, De Portibus Maris (Hargrave, Law Tracts, 81), the bill sought to have obstructions, nuisances, and purprestures in a navigable river abated, and it was proved that the defendants had erected houses on the bank so as to straiten the river and to incommode the passage to and from the shipping to the shore, the houses intercepting the commerce to the town and tending to defraud the 39 L. R. A.

revenue, and the encroachments were ordered to be abated on the ground of damage to the city, but it did not seem that they were ever destroyed, as some composition was probably entered into. A similar case is also cited by Lord Hale in the same treatise between the town of Newcastle and Johnson, relating to the right of towage on the river Tyne.

To make use of the banks of a river for dumping places, from which to cast into the river annually 600,000 cubic yards of mining debris, consisting of boulders, sand, earth, and waste materials, to be carried by the velocity of the stream down its course and into and along a navigable river, is an encroachment upon the soil of the latter and an unauthorized invasion of the rights of the public to its navigation; and when such acts not only impair the navigation of the river but at the same time affect the rights of an entire community or neighborhood, or any considerable number of persons to the free use and enjoyment of their property, they constitute, however long-continued, a public nuisance. People v. Gold Run Ditch & Min. Co. 66 Cal. 133, 147, 56 Am. Rep. 30.

In Ogdensburg v. Lovejoy, 2 Thomp. & C. 83, affirming 58 N. Y. 662, it was held that the filling up of channels and harbors of a river with sawdust so as to obstruct the water was a public nuisance and a violation of a city ordinance relating thereto.

Blood and offal from slaughter houses running into a stream constitute a nuisance. Woodyear v. Schaefer, 57 Md. 1, 10, 40 Am. Rep. 419.

Permitting the blood of slaughtered animals and other refuse therefrom and offal or parts of any animal to run or to be deposited upon the shores or in the waters of a bay, or to remain on the premises, is a nuisance injurious to health. Babcock v. New Jersey Stock Yard Co. 30 N. J. Eq. 296.

The owner of land who cuts a raceway through the same and across a highway is primarily liable to maintain and keep in good repair a bridge across such raceway so long as he continues to use such way, and upon his neglect and refusal to so repair and maintain the same after being duly notified the public authorities have a right to restore such bridge to a safe condition so as to remove an obstruction to the highway and a nuisance thereon. West Bend v. Mann, 59 Wis. 69, 74.

A mill race in use over twenty years, and occupying a part of a public street in an angular form, and uncovered so that the public cannot use the street, is a nuisance abatable by the public authorities either by removing it altogether or causing it to be covered over so as not to interfere with the public use of the streets. Waterloo v. Union Mill Co. 72 Iowa, 437.

Section 2 of the Ohio nuisance act, S. & C. 880, provides that the obstructing and encumbering by fences, buildings, structures, or otherwise in the public roads, shall be deemed a nuisance, and therefore it is the duty of the landowner constructing a race or maintaining a private watercourse cutting across a public road or highway to bridge such watercourse at the point where it cuts the highway; otherwise he would be deemed guilty of a nuisance. Burton Twp. v. Tuttle, 30 Ohio St. 62, 68.

Where the evidence showed that by reason of the increase in travel and traffic upon the street crossings, a certain ditch consequent upon the growth just, and oppressive. (4) That the ordinance is invalid "because it attempts to declare that to be a nuisance which is not a nuisance." The court refused to comply with any of these requests.

We are of opinion that the court erred in not instructing the jury, as requested, that the ordinance was void for uncertainty. If it be assumed, as claimed by the state, that the city, under its charter, is empowered to pass an ordinance regulating the erection and use of awnings, it may still, perhaps, admit of doubt whether it could, by an ordinance, declare that to be a nuisance which was not in fact a nuisance; but, for the purposes of the argument merely, it will be assumed that the city had power to pass the ordinance now in question in its present form. In Webster's International of the city was an obstruction to the use of the streets so as to be properly deemed a highway nuisance, although its character as a nuisance was not shown to exist in any other respect than as such obstruction to certain streets, its character as a nuisance consisting solely in the absence of bridges at the crossings, and being wholly contingent upon that circumstance, it was held that the removal of the nuisance without the destruction of the property or interference with its use could be properly effected by bridging the ditch properly at the street crossings, and that therefore any summary proceedings by the city authorities would be enjoined. Denver v. Mullen, 7 Colo. 345, 354.

In Hart v. Albany, 3 Paige, 213, it is said that the waters of the Albany basin, as well as the waters of the river, are a public highway, and a single canal boat may become a public nuisance by being permanently located in any particular part of the basin for a great and unreasonable length of time, to the exclusion of others finding it necessary or convenient to pass that way or to occupy the same temporarily.

The obstruction of a waterway so that the water accumulates on the street, or so as to prevent the flow of water through or from the street, may be slight, occasional, and temporary, and as such will not interfere with the use of the street or occasion perceptible harm, and will not therefore constitute a nuisance unless it interferes with the use of the street. State v. Wilson, 106 N. C. 718, 720.

So, the mere obstruction of a waterway, so that water accumulates on the street, or so as to prevent the flow of water through or from the streets, does not, per se and necessarily, constitute a public nuisance. State v. Wilson, 106 N. C. 718, 720.

A stream may become a public nuisance in obstructing the highway, and when it does it is the right and duty of the public officers to abate it, and they therefore have the right to restore it to its original channel,—especially where it is found that the plaintiff had filled up an artificial channel on his own land; and if the original channel has also been filled up and the stream thereby turned into the highway without legal authority or right, the party filling up such channel and thus turning the stream into the highway cannot complain or object to the restoration of such stream. Kellogg v. Thompson, 66 N. Y. 88, 92.

And a city ordinance which prohibits the obstruction of a waterway, thereby preventing travel from being hindered, delayed, or impeded, and which prevents such water from being accumulated so as to become stagnant and giving rise to noxious vapors, is valid, and the mere fact that the offense which creates the nuisance is also regulated by the general law of the state will not render it invalid. State v. Wilson, 106 N. C. 718, 720.

A bridge over a navigable stream is not of itself a nuisance, it may or may not be such according to the circumstances. Macomber v. Nichols, 34 Mich. 212, 22 Am. Dec. 522, 526.

The unauthorized erection of a bridge over a public navigable river, which obstructs the navigation, is an offense at common law, on the same principle upon which the erection of gates across a public road has been held to be a nuisance. State v. Freeport, 43 Me. 193, 201; James v. Hayward, Cro. Car. 184; Rex v. Cross, 3 Campb. 224.

Where the board of chosen freeholders had power vested in them by statute to erect a bridge over a certain river at a certain place, it was held that, having exercised such power, they had exhausted the authority given to them under the statute, and that therefore they could not change the location of such bridge, and that such change was unlawful as being an unauthorized obstruction in the channel of the river which was a navigable one, and therefore a public nuisance. Allen v. Monmouth County Chosen Freeholders, 13 N. J. Eq. 68, 73.

Any unauthorized obstruction in a navigable river by means of a bridge or a dam of any kind is a public nuisance which any person may abate, and if it be put there under the authority of the sovereign it will be protected only so far and so long as it is confined within the limits of the authority, and in so far as it goes beyond such authority it is pro tanto a public nuisance. State v. Dibble, 49 N. C. (4 Jones, L.) 107, 115; Renwick v. Morris, 3 Hill, 621; Meares v. Wilmington Comrs. 31 N. C. (9 Ired. L.) 81, 49 Am. Dec. 412; State v. Freeport, 43 Me. 193, 201.

In Com. v. Chapin, 5 Pick. 190, 16 Am. Dec. 386, it was held that it was not a nuisance at common law to dam up the waters of a river so as to prevent the passage of fish, but the remedy for such nuisance or obstruction lies under the Massachusetts statutes.

And an ordinance abating a dam as a nuisance cannot be upheld when, as a matter of fact, it is not shown that such dam is a nuisance per se. Walker v. Board of Public Works, 16 Ohio, 540.

A mill dam is not a nuisance per se, yet it may become so at some places and under special circumstances, and when it does become a nuisance at one place it is no defense to say that a greater nuisance is tolerated elsewhere. Douglass v. State, 4 Wis. 387.

And the maintenance of a dam in such a manner as to cause water to overflow a highway and wash gullies therein constitutes a public nuisance, and if the town which is bound to maintain such highway suffers special damages from such nuisance it may recover the same against the party maintaining it. Charlotte v. Pembroke Iron Works, 82 Me. 391, 8 L. R. A. 828.

Where a dam across a river caused water to be turned back upon a bridge across it in a public highway, thereby destroying the bridge, it was held that the town had a right to recover damages, and that the company's charter was no defense. Hooksett v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 44 N. H. 105.

A raft in a stream rendering the same inconvenient may be declared a nuisance by a city ordinance. Tourne v. Lee, 8 Mart. N. S. 548, 20 Am. Dec. 261.

The obstruction of the public right of fishing in a navigable stream is a public nuisance, and abatable as such. State v. Franklin Falls Co. 49 N. H. 240, 6 Am. Rep. 513.

In Cooley v. Albany, 57 Hun, 327, in which it was sought to hold the city liable for damages occasioned by its nonremoval of a sunken canal boat from the waters of the river, upon the ground that the same was a nuisance, being an obstruction to navigation, it was held that, although under the New York Laws of 1826, chap. 185, the common council were declared commissioners of highways with power to pass ordinances to abate and remove Dictionary the word "awning" is defined as follows: "A roof-like cover, usually of canvas, extended over or before any place as a shelter from the sun, rain, or wind;" and in the Century Dictionary as follows: "A movable roof-like covering of canvas or other cloth spread over any place, or in front of a window, door, etc., as a protection from the sun's rays." As thus defined, "awning" means the covering which shelters or protects, as distinct from its frame or support; and this covering may extend over, or hang in front of, the protected place. It is in the sense of the covering, as distinct from its frame, that the word "awning" is used in this ordinance, for he speaks of the one as distinct from the other. The ordinance does not prohibit all awnings, but only those which do not conform to its requirements. It permits awnings under certain conditions, and in effect, it punishes as a crime the erection or use of awnings which fail in any way to comply with those conditions. This being so, the conditions ought to be stated with such reasonable certainty that the man of ordinary intelligence may with reasonable efforts understand them, and be able to guide his conduct by them. They should be stated so clearly and unambiguously that the average man may with due care know whether in erecting and using his awning, he has or has not committed an act which subjects him to fine and imprisonment in a criminal prosecution. An ordinance of this kind, which limits to a certain extent the use of property, and visits the offender against its provisions with such consequences, ought to be strictly construed; and, when thus construed and tested by the rule above stated, we think this ordinance should be held to be invalid. The ordinance in effect prohibits the use and erection of any awning "except the same be upon a suitable frame, and attached entirely to the building, and which awning shall not, when extended, be less than 6 feet from the sidewalk." Here are three conditions to be complied with, namely: (1) The awning must "be upon a suitable frame." (2) Taking the ordinance just as it reads, the "awning" is to be "attached entirely to the building." (3) The awning "shall not, when extended, be less than 6 feet from the sidewalk." Taking these conditions in reverse order, what does the third mean? Does it mean that the awnnuesances in any street or wharf and to prevent obstructions in the river near or opposite to any wharves, docks, or slips, and although such sunken boat might be a nuisance, and although there was no other practicable way of abating it except by its destruction, yet the power to do so was not conferred under the statute.

And the same point was practically held in the case of Seaman v. New York, 80 N. Y. 239, 36 Am. Rep. 612, although the question of nuisance did not there arise.

In Dzik v. Bigelow, 27 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 360, the plaintiff claimed damages against the city authorities for entering and taking possession of a house or boat in a navigable river and ruining and destroying it, the boat in question being a shanty or jobat situated below high-water mark and used as a private residence. The court held the action of the public authorities as justifiable, the same being a public nuisance, the defendant having been notified by the public authorities to remove the same.

So, a floating store so permanently moored in the Albany basin, secured in its place by means of spikes or posts driven into the earth in the bottom of the basin, is prima facie a nuisance, and equity will leave the owner thereof to his legal remedy against those who removed it as such. Hart v. Albany, 3 Paige, 213.

The legislature has power to establish lines in Boston harbor beyond which no wharf shall be extended or maintained, and to declare any wharf extending or maintained beyond such lines to be a public nuisance. Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53.

The right to maintain an action for damages for obstructing a highway at the landing of a river was upheld in Pittsburgh v. Scott, 1 Pa. 308, 320.

It is not an obstruction or a nuisance to build a wharf in a navigable stream if a sufficient passageway is left for the public, but aliter if no sufficient passageway is left. Com. v. Crowninshield, 2 Dane, Abr. 697. Com. v. Pierce, 2 Dane, Abr. 696 followed.

The law conferring upon individuals the right of building wharves in front of their lands in navigable rivers does not confer an unlimited privilege; it annexes these qualifications, that such wharves do not improperly impede the public navigation. When this is done they become public nuisances. Frink v. Lawrence, 20 Conn. 117, 121, 50 Am. Dec. 274. 39 L. R. A.

So, a municipality cannot, by its special act, declare a private wharf an obstruction and a nuisance when it is not so in fact, although under its charter it may have power to prevent obstructions and nuisances in waters. Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 505, 19 L. ed. 966.

The mere fact that the dock department and the municipality itself have permitted ferry companies using other slips to encumber them by structures of similar description both before and after the passage of an act of the state legislature relating to the changing of the bulk-head lines will not legalize this structure, as the authority conferred upon the board is not discretionary, but absolute and positive, forbidding the waters of the slips to be obstructed or encumbered by such a structure beyond the bulk-head line. New York v. Cunard S. S. Co. 61 Hun, 346.

In Frink v. Lawrence, 20 Conn. 117, 121, 50 Am. Dec. 274, the committee found that a valuable wharf existed, and that the dock on its north side was a very safe and convenient one much frequented by vessels, and that the business done at the wharf was principally with vessels lying upon the north side of it, and that the defendant was about creating an obstruction which would exclude the access of all vessels to that dock and to that side of the wharf. It was held that such act would work a serious and irreparable injury and would manifestly be a public nuisance.

In Atty. Gen. v. Terry, L. R. 9 Ch. 423, 30 L. T. N. S. 215, 22 Week. Rep. 395, an information was filed at the relation of the mayor, etc., of the town against the defendant and wharf owner who threw tiles into the bed of a river extending the wharf so as to occupy 3 feet out of a breadth of about 60 feet valuable for navigation. It was held that such act was an obstruction and a nuisance and restrainable at the suit of the municipal corporation, which was empowered by act of Parliament to remove obstructions.

In Franklin Wharf Co. v. Portland, 67 Me. 46, 59, 24 Am. Rep. 1, where it was sought to recover damages for the obstruction of the plaintiff's wharf by reason of deposits of sewage from a sewer constructed by the defendant with an outlet at the head of the dock of the plaintiff's wharf, the court held that the defendants under the Statutes of 1857, chap. 16, §§ 2 and 3, and the Laws of 1860, chap. 153, had the right to construct such sewers and to use ing, or the frame, or both, must be at least 6 feet above the sidewalk, or 6 feet laterally from the sidewalk, or both? What is the precise meaning of the second condition? What is it that is to be "attached entirely to the building,"—the awning, or the frame, or both? What is meant by the phrase "entirely attached?" Does it mean that every part of the awning or the frame or both, are to be attached to the building? To the person who desires to exercise his property rights, and to have the benefit of an awning, and yet to obey the ordinance, these questions must be quite perplexing, and the ordinance does not clearly and certainly answer them, so as to be a guide to the average man using due care in the premises. If, however, it can be fairly said, with reference to the first two conditions, that these doubts and uncertainties are the ordinary ones that arise as to the construction of every law, that they may be obviated by a reasonable construction of it, and that they are not of such a nature as to warrant this court in holding the ordinance to be void on account of them,—with reference to these two conditions this claim may be true, but it is not true as to the first condition. That requires the awning to be "upon a suitable frame," and the ordinance furnishes no criterion by which the question of suitability can possibly be determined. It does not define the word "suitable," as here used, and the law does not define it. Indeed, when it is thus used, it is incapable of any general or legal definition. Batters v. Dunning, 49 Conn. 479; Smith's Appeal, 65 Conn. 185. Its use, of necessity, implies the judgment of some tribunal or person who is to determine the question of suitability, and yet neither the charter nor the ordinances of the city empowers any person or tribunal to exercise such judgment. This term "suitable," as here used, seems altogether too vague and indefinite to serve as the basis of an ordinance so highly penal in its consequences as this one is. On the whole, we are of opinion that the ordinance in question is void for uncertainty, and that the court below erred in not instructing the jury to that effect.

There is error in the judgment complained of, and it is reversed.

The other Judges concur.

them in a reasonable manner for conducting and depositing therein refuse matters and impurities, but that it was their duty to cause such docks to be cleared thereof whenever an obstruction to navigation or injury to public health occurred, and that any neglect in so doing would constitute a public nuisance.

But under a city charter empowering a corporation to abate or remove any nuisances in any street or wharf, or to prevent all obstructions in the river near or opposite to such wharves, the public authorities have no power to remove a bulk head at the end of a basin in the river at the termination of a canal, erected under the authority of a special act of the legislature by a corporation, although such bulk head may be or is a public nuisance, as endangering the health of the subject, corporations having no powers but those which are derived from their charter, or special act of the legislature. People v. Albany, 11 Wend. 539, 27 Am. Dec. 95.

So, in Evansville v. Martin, 41 Ind. 145, the city was not incorporated or acting under the general law for the incorporation of cities but under a special charter provision which gave it power "to regulate all wharves on the shore of the Ohio river adjoining such city whether the same be public or private, and the amount of wharfage to be charged at or for the use of the same." It was sought to abate buildings erected by the defendant below the high-water line as a nuisance, and to impose a fine provided for by the ordinance. The court held the city had no such power, the ordinance giving no authority to define the line of high-water mark.

In Moore v. Board of Comrs. of Pilots, 32 How. Pr. 184, the court upheld the action of the defendants in removing a platform or structure erected in the slip adjoining a pier, the same being an obstruction and a public nuisance.

And the filling up of a canal by the public authorities, which has been in constant use during the season of navigation and, while kept at its proper depth and before obstructed by rubbish, is a valuable highway to the public and the owners of property, is not a proper exercise of the power to abate nuisances under its charter, where the obstructions could have been removed, and the alleged nuisance, caused by the failure of the corporation itself to exercise the powers conferred upon it by charter to preserve canals and slips in the city by preventing the casting into them of obstructions and filth, could have been abated by the plaintiff himself, at a less expense and without injurious consequences to the public health. Babcock v. Buffalo, 56 N. Y. 268, Affirming 1 Sheldon, 817.

So, whatever power a city has to remove the obstruction complained of as a public nuisance, it cannot be held that under an act authorizing the city to dredge and clear obstructions from a certain creek, and to maintain the same in a navigable condition and assess not less than half of the expense upon the property benefited, the city has the power to remove such obstructions and to make the assessment, the act not saying that the common council may remove the obstruction, unless they have the power to abate it as a public nuisance, or unless it is created by the carelessness or negligence of the defendant, but conferring an absolute power to remove obstructions, etc. Buffalo Union Iron Works v. Buffalo, 13 Abb. Pr. N. S. 141, 146.

And an ordinance declaring a certain branch of a river a public nuisance, and making provision for the abatement of the same by means of a new channel, is within the power of the city authorities to enact. Hamilton v. Fond du Lac, 40 Wis. 47, 51.

As to how far a stream may be polluted for mining purposes, see note to Drake v. Lady Ensey Coal, I. & R. Co. (Ala.), 24 L. R. A. 64.

Upon the question of nuisances as injurious to health, arising from water and watercourses, see note to Harrington v. Providence (R. I.) 38 L. R. A. 305.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT (Department 2).

Margaret Sutton AINSWORTH, Exrx., etc., of George J. Ainsworth, Deceased, Resp.,
v.

BANK OF CALIFORNIA, Appt.

(.....Cal.....)

1. A definition of what a counterclaim is, and not a mere rule for pleading counterclaims, is stated by Code Civ. Proc. § 438.
2. The immaturity of a debt at the time of the debtor's death does not prevent it from being set off against a claim due to the estate if it is mature at the commencement of the action, as prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 438.

(December 30, 1897.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Alameda County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover a deposit which had been made by plaintiff's testator with the defendant bank. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. James M. Allen, for appellant:

The answer of the defendant shall contain a statement of any new matter constituting a defense or counterclaim.

Code Civ. Proc. § 437.

The counterclaim must be one existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff, between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of one of the following causes of action: In an action arising upon contract; any other cause of action also arising upon contract and existing at the commencement of the action.

Code Civ. Proc. § 438.

The defendant may set up any other cause of action arising upon contract and existing at the commencement of the action."

St. Louis Nat. Bank v. Gay, 101 Cal. 290.

The credit of $5,974.53 given on the note of respondent was compulsory.

All claims arising upon contracts, whether the same be due, not due, or contingent, must be presented to decedent's legal representative.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1498.

Every claim which is due must be supported by the affidavit of the claimant, or someone in his behalf, that the amount is justly due, that no payments have been made thereon which are not credited, and that there are no offsets to the same, etc.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1494; Knecht v. United States Sav. Inst. 2 Mo. App. 563.

In order to entitle a defendant to a set-off against an executor or administrator, it is not necessary that the defendant's debt should have been actually due, or really liquidated, at the death of the testator or intestate.

Waterman, Set-Off, § 97; Ravson v. Copland, 3 Barb. Ch. 166; Mathewson v. Strafford Bank, 45 N. H. 104; Skiles v. Houston, 110 Pa. 255.

NOTE.—As to set-off of claims against decedent's estate, see also Koons v. Mellett (Ind.) 7 L. R. A. 231; Fiscus v. Moore (Ind.) 7 L. R. A. 235; Blood v. Kane (N. Y.) 15 L. R. A. 490; Gonnell v. Flack (Md.) 18 L. 39 L. R. A.

Set-off is in all cases useful to prevent circuity of action. But where one of the parties is dead, insolvent, bankrupt, or removed beyond the jurisdiction of the court, it is absolutely necessary to prevent gross injustice.

Byles, Bills, 349; Waterman, Set-Off, §§ 16, 24; Temple v. Scott, 3 Minn. 419.

The demands of appellant and respondent are cross demands, and should be deemed compensated, so far as they equal each other.

Code Civ. Proc. § 440; Hart v. Cooper, 47 Cal. 77; Lyon v. Petty, 65 Cal. 322; Concery v. Langdon, 66 Ind. 311.

Appellant had a banker's lien on said sum of $5,974.53.

1 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 324.

Such a lien arises upon the maturity of the note.

Colebrooke, Collateral Securities, § 61; Civil Code, § 3054; Overton, Liens, § 80.

Appellant had the right to apply said $5,974.53 on its note when it became due.

The relation between banker and depositor is that of debtor and creditor.

Boone, Banking, § 40; Civil Code, §§ 1878, 1818.

The character of the banking business is such that it necessarily follows that if a customer, being a depositor, owes the bank, and he then makes a deposit of money with it, such money will be passed on the books of the bank to his credit, and will stand pro tanto as a payment of his indebtedness.

Overton, Liens, § 80; Central Nat. Bank v. Connecticut Mut. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54, 26 L. ed. 692; State Bank v. Armstrong, 15 N. C. (4 Dev. L.) 519; Ford v. Thornton, 3 Leigh. 695.

Messrs. Davis & Hill and Rodgers & Patterson, for respondent:

Had the executrix received letters testamentary and presented her check for this balance, on, say, December 1, it would hardly be contended now that the bank could have refused payment of the check because it held Mr. Ainsworth's unmatured note for a greater amount. In that case the money would have passed into the hands of the executrix and become a part of the assets to which all creditors might resort for payment of their demands against the estate, and the holder of the note would have occupied the same position with respect thereto as any other creditor.

Babcock v. Booth, 2 Hill, 181, 38 Am. Dec. 578.

A rule which would allow this counterclaim would in many cases take assets out of administration, through proceedings in which creditors and others interested in the result could not be heard; would pay the debt of one creditor out of the assets of the estate, notwithstanding other creditors, even those preferred by the statute, got nothing; would render inoperative the provisions for temporary support of the family of the deceased—to which, under probate proceedings, all debts are postponed; would, in brief, make the statutory system of closing up estates inoperative in every case where the rule might be invoked. The counterclaim must be rejected on this ground.

This counterclaim should be rejected for want of mutuality.

Patterson v. Patterson, 59 N. Y. 574, 17 Am. Rep. 384.

Chipman, C., filed the following opinion:

The facts are admitted, and found to be as follows: September 27, 1895, George J. Ainsworth, plaintiff's testator, executed his note to the Bank of California for $10,000, payable December 26, 1895. He was a customer of the bank, and at his death, October 20, 1895, had on deposit there to his credit the sum of $5,974.25. On December 26, 1895 (the day the note matured), the bank, without the consent of respondent, applied this sum on the note. On December 30, 1895, letters testamentary were issued to respondent by the superior court of Alameda county. February 17, 1896, respondent presented her check for said deposit to the bank, and demanded payment, which was refused. February 21, 1896, the bank presented its claim on said note therein, crediting it with said sum of $5,974.53, which claim was rejected on March 3. On March 9, 1896, plaintiff commenced her action to recover the sum so deposited. In its answer the bank set up its presented claim, and claimed the right to use it as a counterclaim, under §§ 487, 438, Code Civ. Proc., and also the right to apply said deposit on said note by virtue of its banker's lien, and also that the two debts—the note and said deposit of $5,974.53—should be deemed compensated, so far as they equal each other, under § 440, Id. There is no finding or evidence as to the solvency or insolvency of the estate. The court denied the right of defendant to use the note as a counterclaim, or to apply the said sum of $5,974.53, on the note, and denied the right to such "compensation." Judgment was given for plaintiff for $5,974.53, and for defendant for $10,000 and interest, payable in due course of administration. The appeal is from the judgment, and comes here on bill of exceptions.

Under § 487 a defendant may answer by "(2) a statement of any new matter constituting a defense or counterclaim . . ." A counterclaim is, by § 438, defined to be "one existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff, between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of one of the following causes of action: . . .

(2) In an action arising upon contract; any other cause of action also arising upon contract and existing at the commencement of the action." Counsel for plaintiff (respondent) make an ingenious argument to the effect that these sections simply prescribe a rule for pleading counterclaims, how to plead them and what qualities they must possess in order that they may be pleaded, but leaves the question entirely open "as to what counterclaims are, and what are not, claims upon which a several judgment might be had in the action." It is true that § 438 says that the counterclaim mentioned in § 487 must possess certain elements; but it goes further, we think, and defines what a counterclaim is, as well as when it may be pleaded. The section practically says that a counterclaim is defined to be what the section says may be pleaded as such. It is suggested by respondent that a rule which would allow his counterclaim would in many cases take assets out of administration, through proceedings in which other creditors could not be heard, would pay one creditor to the exclusion of others, would render inoperative provisions for the temporary support of the family of the deceased, to which all debts are postponed; and therefore the rule cannot be sound; citing Fitzpatrick v. Brady, 6 Hill, 581; Leiper v. Lewis, 15 Serg. & R. 108; Jordan v. National Shoe & Leather Bank, 74 N. Y. 467, 30 Am. Rep. 819.

Respondent makes the point, also, that the counterclaim should be rejected for want of mutuality, grounding the objection upon the fact that the note of deceased was not due when he died, and that nothing ever did become due from him; that plaintiff sued as executrix, in her representative capacity, for a debt due the deceased at his death, and her title and right of action are to be considered as of that date, as is also the right of defendant to set up the counterclaim, at which time nothing was due defendant,—citing Patterson v. Patterson, 59 N. Y. 574, 17 Am. Rep. 384. The contention is that if A owes B $1,000 upon a promissory note, and B owes A a like sum on a promissory note, both due on the same day in the future, and A meanwhile dies, A's administrator may sue and recover when B's note to A matures, but B cannot plead A's note by way of counterclaim, because B now owes the estate, and not A, and there is no mutuality, because a right of action on A's note did not accrue in A's lifetime. Such is the apparent reasoning of Patterson v. Patterson, 59 N. Y. 574, 17 Am. Rep. 384, and also of Jordan v. National Shoe and Leather Bank, 74 N. Y. 474, 30 Am. Rep. 819, cited by respondent. In the case cited from 6 Hill, the pro rata distribution of an estate was not a question. The case is not in point. The case in 15 Serg. & R. 108, was decided upon the construction given to the act of 1794, then in force in the state of Pennsylvania; and the question was as to the right of a judgment creditor of an insolvent estate gaining a priority over other judgment creditors by taking out and levying a fiere facias which related to a day prior to the intestate's death. The case does not seem to throw any light on this case. In Patterson v. Patterson plaintiff, as executrix, brought suit to foreclose a mortgage executed by defendant to plaintiff's testator given to secure a promise in the nature of an annuity, which by its terms was made to depend upon the testator's death, and was payable to his executrix or administratrix after his death. Defendant set up as counterclaim a claim for rent due him from the testator at the time of his decease. It was said there was no mutuality, and the set-off was disallowed. The case follows the construction given by the English courts to the statute of 2 Geo. II. chap. 22, to which the New York statute was similar. The decision is well considered, and was followed in Jordan v. National Shoe & Leather Bank. The statute of New York (2 Rev. Stat. p. 855, § 23) reads: "In suits brought by executors, etc., demands existing against their testators, etc., and belonging to the defendant at the time of their death, may be set off by the defendant in the same manner as if the action had been brought by and in the name of the deceased." The case of Patterson v. Patterson does not necessarily support respondent, although, as interpreted in Jordan v. National Shoe & Leather Bank, it may be so applied. In this latter case the relation of the claims of the parties was the reverse of Patterson v. Patterson. Jordan sued as administratrix on a demand owned by the intestate in his lifetime, and due and payable to him then, while the promissory note which defendant sought to set off, though owned by it in the lifetime of the intestate, was not due and payable until after his death. It was held that, for a demand to be set off against an executor or administrator in an action brought by him, it must have been due and payable from the decedent in his lifetime. We think that the provisions of our § 438, Code Civ. Proc., read with § 440, are different from the New York statute. The clause, "any other cause of action also arising upon contract, and existing at the commencement of the action (§ 438, subd. 2), is not in the New York statute. Section 440 provides that "when cross demands have existed between persons under such circumstances that, if one had brought an action against the other, a counterclaim could have been set up, the two demands shall be deemed compensated so far as they equal each other, and neither can be deprived of the benefit thereof by the assignment or death of the other." Our statute of set-off, we think, relates to the situation of the parties "at the commencement of the action," and the death of one of the parties to the demand, though such death occur before the maturity of the demand, will not change the relative rights of the parties in pleading a counterclaim, or in compensating the claims so far as they equal each other, provided the set-off be due when the action is commenced.

In New Hampshire and Massachusetts the statutes were said to be substantially the same as the statute of Geo. II. In both these states the rule contended for by appellant was sustained. In Mathewson v. Stratford Bank, 45 N. H. 104, where the question was examined, and the rule as in M'Donald v. Webster, 2 Mass. 498, and Bigelow v. Folger, 2 Met. 255, was followed, a clear distinction is drawn between debts or demands to and from executors in their own right, "and those where the transactions were wholly between the deceased and the adverse party, in the lifetime of the former, but the contingent claims have become absolute, and the claims not due have become payable after the decease. . . ." Said the court: "We are unable to see any good reason why such demands should not be set off against an administrator, when they become absolute and payable." We cannot assent to the doctrine that our statute does not apply because the cross demand of the bank was not due when plaintiff's testate died. It was due when action was brought. St. Louis Nat. Bank v. Gay, 101 Cal. 288. The debt existed at his death. Section 61 of the Indiana Code (2 Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 64) reads almost as our § 440, supra. There is no substantial difference. In Convery v. Langdon, 66 Ind. 811, the New York cases and the New York statute supra were considered, and it was said: The "cross demand must have been an existing demand against the testator or intestate at the time of his death. It is not necessary that the cross demand thus existing . . . should have become due at the time of the testator's . . . death. It is sufficient if it become due and payable in time to be pleaded as a set-off in the same manner as if the testator or intestate had lived to bring the action." See also Waterman, Set-off, §§ 24, 97; Ransom v. Copland, 8 Barb. Ch. 166 (limited and distinguished in Patterson v. Patterson, 59 N. Y. 574, 17 Am. Rep. 884; Mathewson v. Stratford Bank, 45 N. H. 104; Skiles v. Houston, 110 Pa. 255; Byles, Bills, 531, and note 8; Temple v. Scott, 3 Minn. 419 (Gil. 806). It is laid down as the rule in 2 Woerner, American Law of Administration, 398, supported by cases there cited, that, where the defendant and deceased had mutual dealings the judgment can be only for the difference between the claims of the creditor and the decedent; and this is there said to be true, whether the debts are payable simultaneously, or the one in presenti and the other in futuro.

The claim of respondent that by the death of plaintiff's testator the demand passed eo instante to his representatives, and took date by relation to the date of the testator's death, is correct only to this extent: that it passed subject to any right of set-off or counterclaim in appellant. The demand was not an asset of the estate, in the sense claimed, and to the exclusion of appellant's right of set-off. As was said in Richardson v. Parker, 2 Swan, 529: "The notes and accounts of the deceased are not assets, if they have been discharged by payment, the creation of adverse accounts, or otherwise. It is only what remains after all just settlements with the debtors of the estate which goes into the fund for distribution." See Finnell v. Nesbit, 16 B. Mon. 351, and Ely, v. Com., Horine, 5 Dana, 398, therein referred to. See also Ford v. Thornton, 3 Leigh, 695. That the title of the administrator to the assets of the estate takes effect by relation, from the intestate's death, respondent cites Babcock v. Booth, 2 Hill, 181, 33 Am. Dec. 578. In that case the general rule was stated to be that the administrator can only maintain such claims as the testator or intestate might have successfully asserted if living. An exception to the rule was found in the case cited, however, where the deceased was a fraudulent vendor, who remained in possession until his death; and as to his creditors the sale was held void against the fraudulent vendee, who took the property from the possession of the widow after her husband died. We do not think the case before us would be an exception to the general rule as above stated, or that the creditors of the estate would stand in any better position than the testator would himself have stood in, had he lived, and had drawn his check after his note was due, and had been refused payment. Under our Code provisions as to claims against estates of deceased persons, it is compulsory upon the claimant to present his claim under oath stating all offsets and credits. Without doing this he cannot maintain an action, or be paid his claim. The purpose of the law, we think, is to ascertain the balance existing and to give to both the claimant and the estate the benefit of all just offsets, whether the estate be solvent or insolvent. As was said in Aldrich v. Campbell, 4 Gray, 284: "The settlements with such estates [insolvent] are final, and all mutual demands are to be balanced. Claims not liquidated, and debts absolutely due, though payable in the future, are to be included. The balance found upon such adjustment is the only debt remaining. In the case of an insolvent estate of one deceased, all claims existing at the time of the death are to be set off." If this is sound law in the case of insolvent estates,—and we think it is,—it certainly must be so if the estate be solvent, for no harm can come to anyone by applying the rule in the latter case. We find nothing in the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure cited by respondent in conflict with this view of the matter. The inventory required to be made by the administrator or executor by §§ 1443-1446, and the duty imposed by § 1581 to take into his possession all the estate, etc., and to collect all debts due to decedent, etc., cannot affect the rights of creditors of the deceased, or change their relations in respect of mutual obligations.

The view we have taken of the case makes it unnecessary to decide whether the appellant had a right to apply the deposit by virtue of the banker's lien claimed by it. We think the court below erred in its conclusions, and advise that its judgment be reversed, and that judgment be ordered for defendant, payable in due course of administration, for the amount of its note and interest, less the amount of said deposit credited as of the date of December 26, 1895, the date when indorsed on said note.

We concur: Haynes, C.; Searls, C.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the judgment ordered for defendant, payable in due course of administration, for the amount of its note and interest, less the amount of said deposit credited as of the date of December 26, 1895, the date when indorsed on said note.

Re ESTATE OF Ann CALLAGHAN, Deceased.

A devise of specified land in a specified county to designated grandchildren is such a provision for such grandchildren as will prevent their taking the same share in the estate of testatrix as if she had died intestate, although testatrix had no land in such county at the time of making the will, under a statute providing that when any testator "omits to provide" in his will for any children or the issue of any deceased child, unless it appears that such omission was intentional such child must have the same share in the estate of the testator as if he had died intestate.

(January 11, 1898.)

APPEAL by Bertha Callaghan et al. from a decree of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco granting a partial distribution of the estate of Ann Callaghan, deceased, in opposition to their claims for a share in the estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Myrick & Deering for appellants.

Messrs. Bishop & Wheeler, J. H. Creeley, Knight & Heggerty, and W. S. Wood for respondents.

McFarland, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The estate of Ann Callaghan, under administration in the probate court, being in a condition to warrant a partial distribution, petitions for such partial distribution were filed by Daniel T. Callaghan, son of the decedent, and Mary A. Bailey, daughter of the decedent, and certain of said Mary's children. Said Daniel and Mary were the only surviving children; and the petitions for distribution excluded any interest of Bertha Callaghan and Josephine Callaghan, who were grandchildren of the decedent, and minor children of Sherwood Callaghan, who was the son of the decedent, and died during her lifetime. These two grandchildren, Bertha and Josephine, filed oppositions to said petitions for distribution; and they also filed a petition for distribution, in which they claimed that a certain interest in the estate should be distributed to them. The probate court granted the petition of Daniel T. Callaghan and Mary A. Bailey and others, and denied the petition of said grandchildren, who appealed from the order granting the former petition and also from the order denying their petition. The appeals are brought here in two separate transcripts, numbered 881 and 882; but, as the same question arises in each case, the two appeals may be considered together.

The decedent, Ann Callaghan, left a will, and the question here involved arises out of such will. The appellants contend that she omitted to provide for them in her will, and that, therefore, they are entitled to the same share in her estate which they would have had if she had died intestate, under § 1807 of the Civil Code. That section is as follows: "When any testator omits to provide in his will for any of his children, or for the issue of any deceased child, unless it appears that such omission was intentional, such child, or the issue of such child, must have the same share in the estate of the testator as if he had died intestate, and succeeds thereto as provided in the preceding section." By the will nearly all the property of the deceased, with the exception of a few legacies, is given to her said son, Daniel T., and her daughter, Mary A. Bailey, and her children; and the fifth subdivision of the will is as follows: "Fifth. I own six acres of land more or less, in Alameda, Alameda county, state of California. Said land I give, devise, and bequeath to Bertha and Josephine, the two children of Sherwood Callaghan, to be held and enjoyed by them during their lives and the life of the survivor of them; and, in case of their death leaving issue, then to such issue, share and share alike according to representation. But, in case the said Bertha and Josephine die without issue, then said property shall revert to my son, Daniel Callaghan, and my daughter, Mary Bailey, share and share alike." This is the only mention made in the will of the grandchildren Bertha and Josephine. Upon the trial of the petitions in the court below the appellants offered to prove that the testatrix did not own any land in Alameda county at the time the will was made, or thereafter up to the time of her death, and that the estate did not own or claim to own any land in said county; that the testatrix once owned a track of 25 acres in Alameda county, but had sold and conveyed the same to one Hawley before the making of the will, and had never owned or claimed to own any land in said county, other than that so sold to Hawley; and that said grandchildren had never received any portion of the estate of testatrix in her lifetime by way of advancements. This offered evidence was objected to by respondents upon the ground that it was irrelevant, immaterial, etc.; and the objection was sustained, and exceptions reserved. These offers, rulings, and exceptions present the question here involved, viz., whether the will omitted to provide for appellants, within the meaning of said section 1807.

We think that the rulings of the court below were correct. The words "omits to provide," as used in said section, mean simply an omission to make a provision in the will, and have no reference to the pecuniary value of such provision. It is apparent that the Code provision in question expresses no intent to in any way limit the disposing power of a testator, or compel him to provide for any child; for it clearly provides how the testator may decline to give anything to any such relative. This being so, what is the object of the provision? Nearly all the states have provisions substantially the same as that here under consideration; and, as such a provision is not intended as a limitation of the power of a person to dispose of his property by will, it has been uniformly held that the provision applies only to a case where a child or descendant is unknown or forgotten, or for some reason unintentionally overlooked. "The object of the statute was to guard the testator against the effect of a mistake in providing for some of his children, to the exclusion of others, through forgetfulness of their existence, or in otherwise disposing of his property in such forgetfulness, and the failure to allude to them is made evidence that they were so forgotten." McCourtney v. Mathes, 47 Mo. 533. In the case of Payne v. Payne, 18 Cal. 291, the exact provision, as it now stands in the Code, was under review, and Field, Ch. J., speaking for the court, said: "The children are mentioned three times in the codicil, showing that they were in the mind of the testator at the time, and not overlooked in the disposition of his property. And the only object of the statute is to protect the children against omission or oversight, which not infrequently arises from sickness, old age, or other infirmity, or peculiar circumstances under which the will is executed. When, however, the children are present to the mind of the testator, and the fact that they are mentioned by him is conclusive evidence of this, the statute affords no protection, if provision is not made for them." We do not see any controlling force in the suggestion made by appellants, that in § 1807 the word "mentioned" is not used, while it is used in certain preceding sections. The omission of that word does not change the purpose and intent of the section as above declared. An argument similar in character to this is fully answered by the court, through Crockett, J., in the case Re Garraud, 35 Cal. 342. In the case at bar the appellants were not only mentioned, but an express specific provision was made for them in the body of the will; and there can therefore be no pretense that they were unknown, forgotten, or unintentionally overlooked.

The only purpose of the evidence offered by appellants and rejected by the court was to show, not that the appellants had been forgotten or overlooked, or not expressly provided for, but that the provision made for them was a mistake of the testator. It is not by any means clear that such evidence, if admitted, would have established such a mistake. The testatrix may have known that she had no land in Alameda county, and may have intended thus to dispose of the hopes of her grandchildren, and it is admitted that her declarations could not have been introduced to show a different intent. But the most that appellants can claim is that the evidence would have shown a mistake; and it is established law that after the death of a testator a mistake in his will cannot be corrected, nor can the will be reformed or remodeled. "No bill in equity lies to reform a will, because its author is dead, and his intent can only be known from the language he has used." Patch v. White, 117 U. S. 219, 29 L. ed. 865. "It is not here attempted to reform the instrument so as to make it speak really the intentions of the testator. No court can do this." 3 Redf. Wills, p. 48. The evidence offered by appellants was therefore properly excluded. Of course, where, in a will, there is an imperfect description of either person or property, the description may be made more certain, when it can be done either from the context of the will, or from extrinsic evidence, and such is the meaning of § 1840 of the Civil Code, relied on to some extent by appellants. But in the case at bar there was no imperfect description of either the persons or the property mentioned in the will. The appellants were expressly named in the will, and there is no doubt that they were intended, and there is no question made as to what tract of land in Alameda county was intended. It is not contended that, either by extrinsic evidence or otherwise, the description of the property mentioned in the will could be made to apply to any other track of land, and appellants do not claim any other particular piece of land. The case is therefore materially different from Patch v. White, 117 U. S. 219, 29 L. ed. 865, cited by appellants. That case was an action of ejectment, in which the plaintiff claimed title to the lot of land in contest under a devise in a certain will. The question was whether or not the lot was the one devised to plaintiff's grantor, and the court, by a bare majority (four justices dissenting), held that there was a latent ambiguity, and that parol evidence was admissible to show that an imperfect description in the will should be applied to the lot in contest. No such question arises in the case at bar. The above views make it unnecessary to consider the contention of respondents that these appeals are improperly taken in the name of the guardian of the grandchildren.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

I concur: Henshaw, J.

Temple, J., concurring:

I concur in the opinion, but I think the appeal should be dismissed. The guardian may appear and prosecute or defend actions for his ward, but, under our Code, must do so in the name of his ward. Section 869 of the Code of Civil Procedure expressly authorizes administrators and executors to sue as though trustees of an express trust. In some states this same privilege is awarded to guardians, but our Code provides (§ 878) that a ward shall himself be a party to a suit which shall bind his estate. It has been held in some jurisdictions where there is no special statutory provision upon the subject that a guardian can maintain an action in his own name upon an obligation made by himself as guardian, and also that as to such contracts he may be sued. Such cases also hold that he is the owner of, and personally liable on, such contracts, and only liable to account in reference to them as trustee of his ward. In case of his death such choses in action go to his representatives. Chitwood v. Cromwell, 12 Heisk. 658. Whether, in the probate court, the guardian should appear to object to proposed distribution in his own name as guardian or in the name of his ward, was immaterial; but no one can appeal from a judgment, except the parties to it, or those in privity with the parties. And even as to parties the record must show that their interests are, or may be, affected by the judgment. The subject will be found fully considered in 9 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 929; also, Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 343, note. See also Fox v. Miner, 32 Cal. 112, 91 Am. Dec. 566; Wilson v. Wilson, 36 Cal. 451, 95 Am. Dec. 194; Justice v. Ott, 87 Cal. 581; O'Shea v. Wilkinson, 95 Cal. 454; Dixon v. Gries, 106 Cal. 506.

In Re Rose, 66 Cal. 241, this question was not raised. The question there was whether the general guardian, or the attorney appointed by the probate judge to represent the minor, should appear for the minor in the probate court. Nothing is there said as to the propriety of the appeal taken in the name of the guardian, and the record does not show that any objection was made on that ground. Under such circumstances, we cannot presume that it was intended to overrule other decisions upon this question without noticing them. The guardian was not in privity with his ward nor is he a person interested. The judgment was not for or against him, but, if he can appeal in his own name, he is thereby made a party, and the judgment here would be for or against him. This is in violation of the Code, which provides that in such cases the ward shall be the party, although he must appear by guardian. I also concur in the judgment.

SUPERIOR COURT OF SACRAMENTO COUNTY, Respt.

(..... Cal.)

1. Refusal to permit a man charged with contempt by publications respecting evidence in a judicial trial to show in defense that the publications were true, and for this purpose to disprove the accuracy of the reporter's notes which have been offered against him, is such a deprivation of his constitutional right to make a defense as to be a denial of due process of law.
2. An examination of the evidence may be made on certiorari for the purpose of determining the claim that the court exceeded its power.

(Harrison, Temple, and Henshaw, JJ., dissent.)

(December 27, 1897.)

CERTIORARI to the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco to review an order adjudging the petitioner guilty of contempt of court. Order annulled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Delmas & Shortridge, John E. Richards, and Garrett McEnerney, with Mr. P. Reddy, for petitioner:

The court had no jurisdiction, power, or authority to punish the petitioner for the publication of the articles complained of.

No speech or publication reflecting upon or concerning any court or any officer thereof shall be treated or punished as a contempt of such court unless made in the immediate presence of such court while in session, and in such a manner as to actually interfere with its proceedings.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1209, subd. 12 (Stat. 1891, p. 7); Re Shortridge, 99 Cal. 532, 21 L. R. A. 755; Re Buckley, 69 Cal. 1.

All the decisions in this court upon the question of contempt have recognized all the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure and the Penal Code concerning contempt as consistent with the Constitution, and in force.

Batchelder v. Moore, 42 Cal. 412; Galland v. Galland, 44 Cal. 475, 13 Am. Rep. 167; Johnson v. San Francisco City & County Super. Ct. 63 Cal. 578; Lezinsky v. Contra Costa County Super. Ct. 72 Cal. 510; State v. Kaiser, 20 Or. 50, 8 L. R. A. 584; Ex parte Abbott, 94 Cal. 383.

The specification of acts constituting the offense of contempt would exclude all others, under well-established rules of construction.

NOTE.—As to denial of right to make defense, see cases in note to Hovey v. Elliott (N. Y.) ante, p. 449.

State v. Morrill, 16 Ark. 384.

The legislature had the absolute and inherent power to make such changes as it might deem proper.

Wickersham v. Brittan, 98 Cal. 40, 15 L. R. A. 106; State v. Morrill, 16 Ark. 384.

Where the defendant is denied a hearing, any judgment pronounced against him is absolutely void.

Mr. A. P. Catlin, with Mr. S. S. Holl, for respondent:

The statute providing: "But no speech or publication reflecting upon or concerning any court or any officer thereof shall be treated or punished as a contempt of such court unless made in the immediate presence of such court, while in session, and in such a manner as to actually interfere with its proceedings,"—does not prevent this proceeding.

The Constitution places no limitation upon the power of superior courts to punish for contempts.

No one will claim that the legislature of California has not the power to punish its own members or other persons for insolvent or contemptuous behavior in its presence during its sessions.

Mr. Freeman, in his notes on Percival v. State (Neb.) 50 Am. St. Rep. 578, says: "While there is still controversy upon the subject, we think reason and the great weight of authority concur in affirming that, though it may be competent for the legislature to regulate proceedings in cases where contempts are alleged to have been committed, it cannot thereby, nor otherwise, take from courts of general jurisdiction their inherent power to command the respect due to them and their decisions; and therefore the authority to punish for contempt need not be founded on any statute, nor is it subject to statutory destruction," citing—

Van Fleet, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Certiorari to review an order of respondent adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt. While the cause of Talmadge against Talmadge was on trial in the superior court of Sacramento county an article appeared in the Sacramento Bee, a newspaper published in the city of Sacramento, purporting to be an account of certain testimony given by one of the witnesses; and when, at the opening of court next day, its attention was called to the article by one of the attorneys in the cause, the judge stated from the bench that he had no hesitation in saying that the statement referred to was a grossly false statement, a gross fabrication, and that there was not the slightest ground in the testimony of the witness upon which such a statement could be based. In the afternoon of that day the Bee published in its editorial columns the following article: "The Bee will not keep in its employ a reporter who garbles or who misstates, but when a newsgatherer does his duty and tells the truth it will not stand silently by while an aggregation of attorneys tries to make him out a liar, and while a prejudiced and vindictive czar upon the bench aids and abets them in such a purpose. The Bee reasserts that in all material details the statement of Talmadge, as given in the Bee of yesterday, was the statement that he made upon the stand at Monday afternoon session. The Bee will go further than that. It will declare that both the attorneys before the bar and the judge on the bench knew that the statement made in the Bee was an essentially correct epitome of the testimony given by Mr. Talmadge at the very moment when they unhesitatingly, shamelessly, and brazenly declared it to be a gross fabrication. There is no paper anywhere that has a higher regard for fair and impartial courts than has the Bee, but there is no paper anywhere that has a supremacy of contempt than has the Bee for a judge who will approve the unmitigated falsehood of an attorney, as Judge Catlin to-day approved the brazen misstatement of Judge J. B. Devine." Similar language was repeated in the columns of the newspaper on the two succeeding days. The petitioner herein is the editor and one of the proprietors of the Bee, and on June 2, 1896, upon an affidavit of Mr. C. T. Jones, setting forth these publications, and that the same was an interference with the proceedings of the court in the trial of the cause, and constituted a contempt of said court, a citation was issued directing him to show cause why he should not be punished for said contempt. In obedience to the citation the petitioner appeared in court, and filed an answer acknowledging that the article was published by his authority, and justifying its publication upon the ground, among others, that it was in fact a correct report of the proceedings at the trial, and that it was published in order to defend himself from the charge made by the judge of the court, and in his answer repeated the charges made in the article published. Upon the hearing of the charge the court found the facts in accordance with the affidavit of Mr. Jones, and that the publications were an unlawful interference with the proceedings of the court in the trial of the cause, and adjudged the petitioner guilty of the contempt alleged, and that he pay a fine of $500. The petitioner seeks by this proceeding a judgment annulling this order of the superior court.

There is but one point which need be considered. It is contended, and we think correctly, that the order under review is void for the reason, clearly disclosed by the record, that the petitioner was denied his constitutional right to be heard in his defense. The charge against him was in making certain publications in his newspaper relating to the evidence in the case on trial, alleged in the affidavit upon which he was cited to be "false, scandalous, and defamatory," and which "were intended to degrade the said court, and excite public prejudice and odium against it, and were unlawful interferences with the proceedings of said court." The gravamen of this charge was the alleged false character of the publications, and the wrongful intent of petitioner in making them to bring the court into contempt, and thus interfere with the orderly administration of justice in the cause on trial. That this was the understanding and theory of the prosecution if shown by the course of proceeding in the court below. To prove the false character of the matter published by petitioner, the prosecution introduced the court reporter, who testified that the matter published, purporting to be a statement of the evidence as given in the action on trial at the time, did not accord with his notes of such evidence; and to show that petitioner acted with malicious intent, it was proved by the reporter that before the second publication appeared he had furnished to petitioner what purported to be a correct transcript of his notes of that portion of said evidence to which the publication referred. This was substantially the case of the people, the publications being admitted. The substantive defense was that the publications were in fact true, and not made with any wrongful intent; that the personal references therein to the judge were merely in response to the aspersion of the latter cast upon petitioner in characterizing the statements in his newspaper as false and fabricated, when in fact they were not; and that such personal references were not made for the purpose of interfering with the administration of justice. That this was a complete defense, if sustained by evidence, there can, we think, be no doubt. The publication of the truth as to legal proceedings is not a contempt of court (Re Shortridge, 99 Cal. 528, 21 L. R. A. 755), and the criticism of the action of the judge, if made only in proper response to an unjust charge against petitioner's veracity, and without intent to improperly influence the proceedings of the court, would not be contemptuous. It is said that the language of the judge was not directed at petitioner, but to the reporter on his paper; but we do not think the language will justly bear this limitation. A judge on the bench no more than any other can cast aspersions upon the character of a person not a party or participant in a case on trial, without a right in the latter to defend himself. Petitioner might not have been able to establish this defense, but he was not permitted to make the effort. When the case of the people rested this occurred: "Mr. Reddy: We want to call witnesses to show that the publication in the Bee was in point of fact true. The Judge: I will not hear testimony further than what has already appeared on that subject, as stated by the reporter. I will not allow this matter to degenerate into a controversy as to the correctness of the reporter's notes. Mr. Reddy: Then we will not be allowed to introduce any evidence at all,—is that the proposition?—if these notes are to be taken as correct? The Judge: I shall act only on the official notes, as given you by the reporter. I will hear no other testimony. Mr. Reddy: We wish to show that the notes are not correct, in so far as they differ from the report in the Bee, and that the testimony as reported in the Bee was actually given on that occasion. The Judge: I will not hear any outside testimony other than the notes of the official reporter. . . . Mr. Reddy: Your honor will allow no testimony except the reporter's notes? The Judge: No. Mr. Reddy: Then your honor will not permit us to put in evidence the subject-matter,—the allegation of the answer? The Judge: I have made my ruling that I will hear no testimony in regard to the evidence that was taken there except what is contained in the notes of the official reporter, and they have been fully given, and I will add to that the cross-examination of Mr. Duden [the reporter] with respect to those questions that the court asked him in regard to the time when he delivered the transcribed notes to the Bee." Thereupon the defendant offered and requested to be allowed to introduce evidence in support of the various subdivisions of his answer, involving as a whole the same general issues as suggested above, but was denied such right except to the extent that he was told he would be allowed to show that the publications were "without malice." This privilege was declined as of no avail, unless petitioner was allowed to put in his entire defense.

That the result of this action of the court in thus requiring petitioner, in effect, to submit his defense upon the evidence for the people, was in substance and effect to deprive petitioner of the right to be heard in his defense, is, we think, obvious. It is contended by respondent that, even if the action of the court was wrong, it was error merely, which cannot be reviewed on certiorari; that, the court having jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter, the mere method in which it exercised such jurisdiction cannot be inquired into in this proceeding, which looks only to the question of jurisdiction. If the premise were correct, the conclusion would undoubtedly follow. But with the view that the action involved no more than mere error we cannot coincide. It was error, certainly, but it was more than that. It was a transgression of a fundamental right guaranteed to every citizen charged with an offense, or whose property is sought to be taken, of being heard before he is condemned to suffer injury. Any departure from those recognized and established requirements of law, however close the apparent adherence to mere form in method of procedure, which has the effect to deprive one of a constitutional right, is as much an excess of jurisdiction as where there exists an inceptive lack of power. "The substance and not the shadow determines the validity of the exercise of the power." Postal Tele. Cable Co. v. Adams, 155 U. S. 689, 698, 39 L. ed. 812, 816.

While the writ of certiorari is not a writ of error, "it is nevertheless," as suggested in Schwarz v. San Francisco City & County Super. Ct. 111 Cal. 112, "a means by which the power of the court in the premises can be inquired into; and for this purpose the review extends, not only to the whole of the record of the court below, but even to the evidence itself, where necessary to determine the jurisdictional fact." If, then, by looking at the evidence, we can see that the court exceeded its power, we have a right to examine the evidence for that purpose. The evidence and proceedings in this case disclose clearly to our minds such an excess. Contempt of court is a specific criminal offense (Ex parte Hollis, 59 Cal. 408; Ex parte Gould, 99 Cal. 380, 21 L. R. A. 751), and a party charged therewith, although the proceeding is more or less summary in character, has the same inalienable right to be heard in his defense, especially in instances like the present, of mere constructive contempt, as he would against a charge of murder or any other crime. On this subject it is said in Rapalje on Contempts (§ 111): "Contempt of court is of two kinds,—that which is committed in open court, and that which is committed out of the view and hearing of the court. For the punishment of the first, by commitment and fine, no proceeding need be taken contradictorily with the offender, but for the punishment of the latter, by the same means, the offender must be allowed to offer evidence and argument in his defense, otherwise any judgment which the court may pronounce will be absolutely void." In State, De Buys, v. Orleans Civil Dist. Ct. Judges, 32 La. Ann. 1256, 1262, considering a case of constructive contempt, it is said: "The charge of contempt should not, in any case, be followed by sentence and imprisonment, unless after a rule to show cause has been granted and the party defendant therein heard and permitted to offer evidence and argument." And it is held that anything less than that would constitute a want of "due process of law," or a proceeding not in accord with "law of the land," rendering the judgment void. And the court there quote with approval this justly celebrated definition of the phrase "law of the land" formulated by Mr. Webster in the Dartmouth College Case [17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 581, 4 L. ed. 645]: "By the law of the land is most clearly intended the general law; a law which hears before it condemns; which proceeds from inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial. The meaning is, that every citizen shall hold his life, liberty, property, and immunities under the protection of the general rules which govern society. And in the very recent case of Hovey v. Elliott (decided by the Supreme Court of the United States) 167 U. S. 409, 42 L. ed. 215, where, in a civil action, the court had stricken out the answer of a party because of his contempt of an order requiring him to pay money into court, and rendered judgment against him pro confesso, it was held that the act was beyond the power of the court, for the reason that it deprived the party of the right to be heard in his defense and that the judgment so entered against him was void, even as against collateral attack. Among other things it is there said: "Can it be doubted that due process of law signifies a right to be heard in one's defense? If the legislative department of the government were to enact a statute conferring the right to condemn the citizen without any opportunity whatever of being heard, would it be pretended that such an enactment would not be violative of the Constitution? If this be true, as it undoubtedly is, how can it be said that the judicial department, the source and fountain of justice itself, has yet the authority to render lawful that which if done under express legislative sanction would be violative of the Constitution. If such power obtains, then the judicial power of the government, sitting to uphold and enforce the Constitution, is the only one possessing a power to disregard it. If such authority exists, then, in consequence of their establishment to compel obedience to law and to enforce justice, courts possess the right to inflict the very wrongs which they were created to prevent." And, as showing that it is not sufficient that the court shall go through the mere form of citing a party to appear upon the pretense of giving him a hearing while in fact denying him the right in its substance, it is there said: "Until notice is given, the court has no jurisdiction in any case to proceed to judgment, whatever its authority may be, by the law of its organization over the subject-matter. But notice is only for the purpose of affording the party an opportunity of being heard upon the claim or the charges made; it is a summons to him to appear and speak, if he has anything to say, why the judgment sought should not be rendered. A denial to a party of the benefit of a notice would be in effect to deny that he is entitled to notice at all, and the sham and deceptive proceeding had better be omitted altogether. It would be like saying to a party, 'Appear and you shall be heard;' and, when he has appeared, saying, 'Your appearance shall not be recognized, and you shall not be heard.'" And, quoting from Galpin v. Page, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 350, 21 L. ed. 959, it is said: "It is a rule as old as the law, and never more to be respected than now, that no one shall be personally bound until he has had his day in court, by which is meant, until he has been duly cited to appear, and has been afforded an opportunity to be heard. Judgment without such citation and opportunity wants all the attributes of a judicial determination; it is judicial usurpation and oppression, and never can be upheld where justice is justly administered."

These considerations make it manifest that petitioner at his trial in the court below was denied that "due process of law" requisite to a valid conviction, and for that reason the order convicting him of contempt must be annulled. It is so ordered.

I concur: Garoutte, J.

McFarland, J., concurring:

I concur in the judgment annulling the order under review. The case is a very close one; but I think that the alleged contempt rested ultimately upon the asserted fabrication and publication by petitioner of false testimony, and his persistency in restating this version of the same as true. This being so, he should have been allowed to introduce such evidence as he had to the point that his publication of the testimony was a fair and correct statement of it. The court declined to hear any evidence from him on that subject; and the weight of authority is to the point that this ruling, being a denial of appellant's right to make a defense, goes to the jurisdiction, and is reviewable on certiorari. If petitioner had been allowed to introduce the offered evidence, the case would have presented no difficulties.

Beatty, Ch. J., concurring:

A cause being on trial in the superior court, a newspaper publishes what purports to be a portion of the testimony of one of the parties to the action. The attention of the judge being called to the publication, he pronounces it grossly false from his seat on the bench. The publisher in the next issue of his paper, and while the cause is still on trial, reasserts the correctness of his report, and in coarsely vituperative terms retorts upon the judge the accusation of falsehood. Is this a contempt of court? The answer to this question depends, it seems to me, upon the further question whether or not the judge in denouncing the original report was acting in a judicial capacity. A true report of the proceedings of a court is not a contempt. A false report may or may not be a contempt, according to circumstances. If a false report is published under such circumstances as to constitute a contempt, there is but one way to deal with the matter judicially, and that is by a regular citation or attachment and a hearing. If the court or judge undertakes to act upon the matter in any other way, his action is extrajudicial, and not in his official character. Such, it seems to me, was very clearly the case here. The attention of the judge being drawn to this publication, it was natural, and no doubt commendable, that he, believing it to be gross perversion of the facts, should so characterize it, but in so doing he was not acting as a court or judge. What he said was in no sense a part of any judicial proceeding, and the fact that he was seated on the bench at the time makes the case no different in point of law from what it would have been if his remarks had been delivered on the street or communicated in writing to the same or another newspaper. The report of the newspaper was, therefore, not an attack upon the court or an interference with the proceedings of the court, but was an attack upon the man, for which, if it was malicious and unfounded, he had the same, and no other, means of redress that the law gives to every citizen who is the victim of a libel. The facts alleged and found in the proceeding against the petitioner do clearly establish a malicious libel, but they do not, in my opinion, constitute a contempt of court, and for that reason I concur in the judgment annulling the order.

Harrison, J., dissenting:

Section 1209, Code Civ. Proc., declares that any unlawful interference with the proceedings of a court is a contempt of the authority of the court; and when facts are presented to the court which could, under any circumstances, have interfered with its proceedings in the trial of a cause, it has jurisdiction to investigate the charge of contempt. No question as to the general power of the court is presented in the present case. Its jurisdiction to investigate a charge of contempt is not denied. Whether it had jurisdiction to investigate the charge against the petitioner does not depend upon any review of evidence, but is to be determined by the sufficiency of the affidavit upon which the citation to him was issued. If the facts set forth in that affidavit are sustained, its power to punish for the contempt therein charged follows as a legal conclusion. That the affidavit of Mr. Jones sets forth facts sufficient to give to the court jurisdiction to inquire into the alleged contempt, and to determine whether the acts charged against the petitioner had been committed by him, cannot be questioned, and the regularity of the procedure by which he was brought before the court is not challenged. The court, therefore, had jurisdiction to investigate the charge, and, after its jurisdiction had been thus acquired, any error by it in the course of the inquiry, either in admitting or excluding evidence, is not the subject of review in this proceeding, and its finding of the facts upon which it based its judgment that the petitioner was guilty of contempt is also final.

It is claimed, however, by the petitioner, that the court had no jurisdiction to punish him for the contempt charged without giving him an opportunity to be heard in his defense, and that inasmuch as it refused to receive evidence which he offered at the hearing in support of certain matters which he had set up in his answer as a defense to the charge, and refused to consider these matters, it exceeded its jurisdiction in determining that he was guilty of the contempt charged in the affidavit. The right of one charged with contempt to be heard in answer to the charge is fully conceded; but upon this as upon any other charge his right to be heard is limited to matters that are pertinent to the issue before the court. If he is allowed a hearing upon these matters, he cannot say that he is deprived of his rights without due process of law. The provision in § 1217, Code Civ. Proc., that the court or judge must "investigate the charge, and must hear any answer which the person arrested may make to the same, and may examine witnesses for or against him," does not require the court to hear an answer whose allegations have no tendency to exonerate the person from the charge, or to permit an examination of witnesses upon matters that are not relevant to the alleged contempt. The court is to conduct the investigation under the sanction of its judicial authority, but its determination therein will not be set aside upon the ground that it committed error in the course of the investigation. If the court had refused to allow the petitioner to file any answer to the charge, or if, after permitting his answer to be filed, it had ordered it to be stricken from the files, and had refused to receive any evidence on his behalf in defense of his charge, its judgment against him would have been unauthorized. Instead of doing so, however, the court permitted the petitioner to file such answer as he desired, and also heard all the evidence which he chose to offer in support of the matters therein which were material or relevant to his defense.

In his answer the petitioner had alleged that the original publication of the proceedings was a correct statement of the testimony given before the court, and the refusal of the court to allow evidence in support of this averment is claimed by him to have been a denial of the right to be heard in his defense; but the truth or falsity of this publication was not involved in the charge of contempt before the court. The contempt with which the petitioner was charged did not consist in this publication, but in the subsequent effort on his part to compel the court to accept it as the truth in opposition to its own statement that it was not correct. A false publication of the proceedings of a trial does not of itself constitute a contempt, or render its author liable to punishment. The charge of contempt against the petitioner was the fact that after the court had stated that the testimony contained in that publication had not been given, and while the cause was still in process of trial before it and undetermined, the petitioner had published in his newspaper, in a manner calculated to destroy the freedom of the court in determining the rights of the parties to the controversy then before it for determination, that this judicial declaration was false. The court therefore very properly refused to permit the truth or falsity of the publication to be made an issue of fact in the proceedings upon the charge of contempt; and it also properly denied the offer of the defendant to introduce the evidence given at the trial of the cause of Talmadge against Talmadge, relating to other matters than those involved in the publication. Such evidence could have no bearing or relevance to the matter then under investigation. The case of Talmadge against Talmadge was on trial before the court without a jury. The court was required to make its findings of fact upon the testimony given before it, and to render its judgment in accordance with that testimony. When its attention was drawn to this publication, with a request by one of the attorneys in the case to be informed whether that was the testimony as understood by the court, and it stated from the bench in reply that such testimony had not been given, and that the publication was incorrect, this was a declaration by it that its decision was not in any way to be affected by what was stated in the publication to have been given as testimony in the case. If either of the parties had felt that the court was in error, it would have been proper to point out to it in any competent mode—either by the notes of the stenographer or by the statement of one who had heard it—that such testimony had in fact been given. The court, however, would not have been bound to accept such statement as correct but would still be compelled to decide the cause upon its own view of what was the testimony therein, leaving it to the defeated party to show in any proper mode that it had decided contrary to the evidence. It is manifest, from a mere reading of the article published in the Bee, that it would naturally tend to interfere with the proceedings of the court in the trial of the cause to which it referred, and that the court was authorized to find that it was an unlawful interference with its proceedings. The evident purpose, as well as the natural tendency, of the article in question was to compel the court to accept the facts given in the previous statement in the Bee as the correct version of that portion of the testimony in the case, and was an attempt on the part of the petitioner to coerce the court into deciding the cause upon testimony which in its opinion had not been given; and to the extent that this publication might tend to bring about that result, whether it did in fact effect the purpose or not it was an unlawful interference with the proceedings of the court. If the cause had been on trial before a jury, and the petitioner had approached one of the jurors and made the statements contained in the article, it would not be questioned that he would have been guilty of contempt. It is none the less a contempt that the testimony was to be considered by the court instead of by a jury, nor is the act constituting the contempt diminished by the fact that it was published in a newspaper rather than stated orally. It was published with the evident purpose that it should be read, and it was in fact read by the judge while the cause was still pending before him and undetermined.

The defendant also alleged in his answer that the publication set forth in the affidavit of Mr. Jones was published without malice, and for the purpose of defending himself against the false charges made against him by the judge, and that he then believed that the original publication contained a correct statement of the evidence in the case. At the hearing, after the court had declined to allow any evidence upon the correctness of the original publication, the defendant proposed to offer proof in support of the several matters contained in his answer. The court gave him permission to show that the publication was made without malice, and that he believed it to be true, and also that he believed that he had a right to publish it, and to state his motive therefor. The court also stated that, if he could do so, he might show that the original publication was made from a report compiled by a reporter of the Bee from the testimony which he had heard in court. The defendant declined to accept these offers, or to introduce any evidence upon these matters, his counsel saying: "We desire to put in our entire defense so that it may all go together." As the defendant was given an opportunity to present any evidence in his power relevant to the issue or material to his defense, it cannot be said that his trial was had contrary to the law of the land, or that he was convicted without a hearing.

The defendant's offer to prove by testimony that the publication did not interfere with the proceedings of the court was properly rejected. Whether the publication had such an effect or tendency was a question of law depending upon the nature of the publication and the circumstances under which it was made, and was a question of law to be determined by the court, and not upon the testimony of witnesses.

The claim of the petitioner that by the article published he sought to justify himself against the implied charge of wilful misrepresentation made by the court when its attention was first drawn to the statement of the testimony falls to the ground, in view of the fact that the court had made no reference to the petitioner, but assumed throughout its remarks that the publication had been made by reason of false and incorrect reports made by some one other than the petitioner. Whatever right the defendant might have to defend himself against what he deemed an unjust aspersion in these remarks of the judge, he had no right to do it in such a way as to interfere with the proceedings of the court. Unless courts are permitted to administer justice freely, and without being subjected to intimidation or coercion in their deliberations and decisions they will be powerless to protect those who are injured, or to enforce the rights of those who invoke their aid.

It is contended by the petitioner that by reason of the following provision in § 1209, Code Civ. Proc., as amended in 1891: "But no speech or publication reflecting upon or concerning any court, or any officer thereof, shall be treated or punished as a contempt of such court, unless made in the immediate presence of such court while in session, and in such a manner as to actually interfere with its proceedings,"—the court had no authority to adjudge him guilty of contempt. The effect of this provision was considered in Re Shortridge 99 Cal. 526, 21 L. R. A. 755, and it was said in that case: "No authority has been found which denies the inherent right of a court, in the absence of a limitation placed upon it by the power which created it, to punish as a contempt an act—whether committed in or out of its presence,—which tends to impede, embarrass, or obstruct the court in the discharge of its duties. It is a doctrine which is admitted in all its rigor by American courts everywhere, and does not need the support of foreign authorities based upon the fiction that the majesty of the King, represented in the persons of the judges, is always present in the court. It is founded upon the principle,—which is coeval with the existence of the courts, and as necessary as the right of self-protection,—that it is a necessary incident to the execution of the powers conferred upon the court, and is necessary to maintain its dignity, if not its very existence. It exists independent of statute. The legislative department may regulate the procedure and enlarge the power, but it cannot without trenching upon the constitutional powers of the court and destroying the autonomy of that system of checks and balances which is one of the chief features of our triple-department form of government, fetter the power itself." See also Myers v. State, 46 Ohio St. 478; State v. Frew, 24 W. Va. 416, 49 Am. Rep. 257; Ex parte Barry, 85 Cal. 803; People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179.

It is, however, contended by the petitioner that the Constitution has conferred upon the legislature the right to thus limit the power of courts to punish for contempt of their authority. This proposition is maintained by the following argument: Section 1 of article 23 of the Constitution provides "that all laws in force at the adoption of this Constitution, not inconsistent therewith, shall remain in full force and effect until altered or repealed by the legislature." The chapter of the Code of Civil Procedure relative to contempts was a law in force at the adoption of the Constitution, and, not being inconsistent therewith, was, by virtue of this section, when the people voted for and adopted the Constitution, adopted by them as a part and parcel of that instrument, and so continued until changed by legislation; that the amendment of 1891, having been enacted under the power implied in the clause, "until altered or repealed by the legislature," is to be regarded as if the Constitution had conferred express power upon the legislature to thus limit the power of the courts to punish for contempt. No such effect can be given, however, to the language of this section of the Constitution. The legislature derives no greater power of legislation therefrom than is conferred upon it in article 4 of the Constitution, nor is the judicial department of the state deprived of any of its power by virtue of this section. The purpose and effect of the section was not to change the character of the laws therein referred to, or to give to them any different effect from that which they previously had, but the section was placed in the Constitution for the purpose of avoiding any question of implied repeal of any existing laws that were not inconsistent with the Constitution; or, as is expressed in the preamble to the section, "that no inconvenience may arise from the alterations and amendments in the Constitution of this state." The order of the superior court should be affirmed, and the writ discharged.

1. The unauthorized alteration of an instrument by an agent with whom it is left to be delivered does not bind the principal.

NOTE.—For the effect of an alteration of a negotiable note as affecting bona fide holders, see note to Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Williams (Pa.) 85 L. R. A. 464.

2. Signing an instrument in which the amount to be paid is written in pencil, and leaving it with an agent to be delivered for a loan, do not constitute negligence or render the maker liable to an innocent holder for the forgery of the agent in raising the same.

3. The forgery is the proximate cause of the injury to an innocent holder where an obligation is unlawfully raised by an agent of the maker, although the latter may have been negligent in signing the instrument in such condition as to facilitate the successful perpetration of its fraudulent alteration.

4. An alteration of an obligation, amounting to forgery, by an agent of the maker, does not avoid the contract in its entirety, or prevent a recovery by an innocent holder upon it in accordance with its original terms, if they can be ascertained.

Mr. William P. Veure for appellant.

Mr. John H. Yoell, for respondent:

The court did not err in admitting the promissory note in evidence.

Corcoran v. Doll, 32 Cal. 83; Sedgwick v. Sedgwick, 56 Cal. 213.

The court did not err in admitting the mortgage in evidence.

People v. Torres, 38 Cal. 141; Caldwell v. Parks, 50 Cal. 502; Valleau v. San Francisco City & County Super. Ct. 62 Cal. 290.

The court justly and properly finds Hughes to have been the agent of Mrs. Hunt, the defendant.

As such, she was bound by his fraud.

Griswold v. Haven, 25 N. Y. 595, 82 Am. Dec. 380; Hollingsworth v. Holbrook, 80 Iowa, 151.

Mrs. Walsh was ignorant of and innocent of any fraud equally with the defendant, and in such a case the sufferer must be the person through whose fault and negligence the injury was occasioned. For, to sign notes and mortgages with material parts therein written in pencil is gross negligence.

Harvey v. Smith, 55 Ill. 224; Seibel v. Vaughan, 69 Ill. 257; Young v. Grotz, 4 Bing. 258; Civil Code, § 3548; Blaisdell v. Leach, 101 Cal. 405.

To avail herself of any alteration in the instruments, defendant should have pleaded it specially, and set up and proved the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff thereto.

Humphreys v. Crane, 5 Cal. 173.

The figures were no part of the note at all.

Smith v. Smith, 1 R. I. 398, 53 Am. Dec. 662; Payne v. Clark, 19 Mo. 152, 59 Am. Dec. 338; 1 Wait, Act. & Def. p. 557; Mears v. Graham, 8 Blackf. 144.

No obligation takes effect until it is issued, and a note is issued when and only when it comes into the hands of a party capable of enforcing it.

2 Parsons, Notes & Bills, p. 573.

Of two persons equally innocent he by whose fault the injury was caused should suffer the loss.

Civil Code, § 3548; Blaisdell v. Leach, 101 Cal. 405.

Van Fleet, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action to foreclose a mortgage. The findings show that defendant, who resided in San Francisco, but owned certain premises in San José upon which there was a mortgage for $500, some time prior to October 3, 1893, authorized one Hughes, a real-estate agent and notary public in San José, to negotiate a loan of $500 on said premises, at a rate of interest not to exceed 8 per cent per annum, with the proceeds of which to pay off said mortgage; that, being notified by Hughes that he had found a person willing to make the loan, defendant on October 3, 1893, went to his office in San José to execute the necessary note and mortgage. She was informed by Hughes that the loan could not be had for less than 9 per cent, which rate she consented to pay, and thereupon Hughes presented for her signature a note and mortgage prepared by him, which defendant, after reading, signed and executed, the mortgage being acknowledged before Hughes as notary. The note was in these words:

$500. San José, Cal., October 3, 1893.

Two years after date, for value received, I promise to pay to Mrs. Margaret Walsh, or order, at the office of G. C. Hughes, the sum of five hundred ($500) dollars, with interest thereon from date until payment at the rate of nine (9) per centum per annum, payable quarterly, and, if not so paid, then to be added to and become a part of the principal, and bear a like interest; said principal and interest to be paid in United States gold coin only. If any interest on this note be not paid within two months after it becomes due, then the whole principal and interest shall, at the option of the payee, become and be immediately due and payable. Privilege to pay at any time by paying three months' interest extra. This note secured by mortgage.

Mrs. Emma E. Hunt.

The mortgage was in the usual form, setting out at length a copy of the note, etc. It is found "that, after signing the said note and mortgage as aforesaid, the said defendant left the same with the said Hughes for delivery to the said plaintiff, and returned to her home in San Francisco; that the principal sum of said note, wherever expressed in said note and mortgage, and the rate of interest, wherever specified therein, had been written in pencil by said Hughes at the time he prepared said note and mortgage, and prior to the said visit of said defendant to the office of said Hughes on said 3d day of October, 1893; that after said defendant had left said office of said Hughes as aforesaid, the said Hughes erased said pencil words and figures expressing the principal sum of said promissory note and mortgage and the rate of interest thereon, and wrote in lieu thereof, with pen and ink, the necessary words and figures to make the principal sum of said note and mortgage $1,200 instead of $500, and the rate of interest 10 per cent instead of 9 per cent." In all other respects than as thus changed the note and mortgage remained as when executed by defendant. Thereafter, on the same day, Hughes delivered both instruments as thus altered by him, to the plaintiff, and in return received from her the sum of $1,200 in gold coin, $500 of which he paid in satisfaction of said prior mortgage, and the balance of $700 he retained, and fraudulently converted to his own use. Both plaintiff and defendant were ignorant of the alteration of said instruments until about one year after their execution, when Hughes absconded, and they subsequently met for the first time. Upon these facts the court below gave judgment for plaintiff foreclosing her mortgage for the full amount of said note, principal and interest, as expressed therein after such alteration, and from this judgment and an order denying her a new trial defendant appeals.

It appears from the briefs and arguments of counsel that the considerations actuating the court below in reaching its conclusion were: First, that Hughes being the agent of defendant in the transaction, the latter is bound by his acts, whether expressly authorized or not; second, that defendant was guilty of such negligence in the execution of the note and mortgage as that Hughes was enabled to perpetrate the fraud which deceived the plaintiff, and that defendant is therefore estopped from setting up such fraud as a defense; and these are the two substantive propositions upon which respondent now relies to sustain the judgment. Neither proposition, as it seems to us, receives any adequate support from the findings. Hughes was defendant's agent, it is true, and for his acts as such she is bound; but what was the extent of that agency? He was authorized to find a party willing to make the loan, which he did, and thereupon, as found by the court, the note and mortgage, complete in all their parts, were executed by defendant, and left by her with Hughes "for delivery to the said plaintiff." This, then, was the extent of his express authority as to those instruments,—that of a mere bailee for delivery. There is certainly no express finding of any authority to alter or tamper with the instruments in any respect, and as certainly there is nothing in the facts from which such authority could be implied. Where there is no express authority in the person to whom a note or other instrument is intrusted or delivered to make alterations therein, it is only where such writing is patently incomplete in some respect, such as an omitted date, or a blank space required to be filled to make the contract express the intent of the parties, that there is any implied authority to insert new matter, or make any material addition thereto. Even in such a case the implication must very plainly arise from the circumstances, or the maker will not be bound. This is upon the very obvious principle that any unauthorized change in a material respect destroys the integrity of the instrument as the contract which the maker has executed. It ceases to be his contract, and is avoided, even in the hands of an innocent holder for value. These principles are thoroughly well settled, not only as to deeds and other sealed instruments, but as to commercial paper as well. Angle v. Northwestern L. Ins. Co. 92 U. S. 830, 23 L. ed. 556; McGrath v. Clark, 56 N. Y. 84, 89 L. R. A.

15 Am. Rep. 872; Bruce v. Westcott, 3 Barb. 874; Wood v. Steele, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 80, 18 L. ed. 725; Greenfield Sav. Bank v. Stowell, 128 Mass. 196, 25 Am. Rep. 67. Nor can it make any difference that the alteration is made before delivery of the instrument. Wood v. Steele, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 80, 18 L. ed. 725. Manifestly, whether made before or after that fact, if the alteration be effected by other than the party to be bound, and without his knowledge or consent, it involves the same question of ostensible agency as when made after delivery. In either case the question is whether, under the circumstances, the person making the alteration is to be deemed the agent of the one whose contract is affected. Here, while Hughes was admittedly the agent of defendant for certain purposes, as found by the court, it would be absurd to hold that there was, upon the facts, any implied or ostensible authority conferred upon him to commit a forgery,—the plain legal effect of his act,—and bind the defendant thereby.

The assumed negligence of defendant is based upon that part of the finding above quoted "that the principal sum of said note, wherever expressed in said note and mortgage, and the rate of interest, wherever specified therein, had been written in pencil by said Hughes at the time he prepared said note and mortgage, and prior to the said visit of said defendant to the office of said Hughes;" and the implication, not expressly found as a fact, that defendant signed and executed the instruments in that condition. The respondent's argument is that by her act in executing the papers in that condition, and leaving them with Hughes, she enabled or facilitated the successful perpetration of the fraudulent alteration by which plaintiff was deceived into accepting the note and mortgage, and therein was guilty of such negligence as precludes her pleading such alteration to plaintiff's prejudice,—upon the principle that where one of two innocent persons must suffer, the loss must fall upon the one through whose negligence the injury was occasioned.

The appellant contends that the evidence is wholly insufficient to sustain this feature of the finding; and, if the point were essential to the determination of the case, we should be constrained to adopt this view. But, assuming that mere negligence could ever in such a case be a bar to the defense here made, the fact found does not establish such negligence. In the first place it is not expressly found that the execution of the instrument in the manner indicated was an act of negligence, and no inference to that effect can be deduced from the facts. The court finds that the words which were erased and altered were written in pencil, but it is not found that Hughes's criminal act of spoliation was thereby in any manner facilitated or rendered easier, or that it could not have been as readily accomplished had the words been written in any other manner; and we cannot say, either as an inference of fact or as one of law, that, for the purposes accomplished by Hughes, pencil writing is more readily effaced than ink or other substance. That would depend in any given case upon circumstances not here found, and which the court could not know,—such, for example, as the character of the pencil and paper used, and whether the impression was heavy or light, etc. The mere writing of an instrument in pencil, either in whole or in part, cannot, of itself, be said to be negligence, since the law recognizes the validity of such instruments equally with those written with ink or printed. And in fact there is nothing in the findings that necessarily negatives the fact that the instruments in question were written entirely in pencil. But, if it were conceded that the finding established carelessness or negligence by defendant, which might in some degree have contributed to the successful execution of the fraud by which plaintiff was deceived into parting with her money, it would not then constitute an estoppel. This is upon the principle that a party is not bound in transactions of this character either to anticipate or take precaution against the commission of a crime by which another may be deceived; that where it is through the instrumentality of a criminal act that the wrong is accomplished, it is the crime, and not the negligent act, which is the proximate cause of injury; and in such a case, the maxim that where one of two innocent persons must suffer from the wrongful act of another, the loss must fall upon the one making the act possible, has no application. While there was some diversity in the earlier cases upon the subject in England, commencing with Young v. Grote, 4 Bing. 253, in which the doctrine contended for by respondent was to a certain extent sustained, the trend of the latter cases, even in England, is against the rule announced in Young v. Grote; and, if the case may not be said to have been expressly overruled, its application has at least been so limited to the peculiar circumstances of that case, and the particular relations there existing between the parties, as to render it no longer valuable as authority in any general sense. The more recent cases all support the principles applicable to this class of cases as we have stated them above. Thus, in the case of Knoxville Nat. Bank v. Clark, 51 Iowa, 264, 83 Am. Rep. 129, where the court speaks of the negligence of a drawer of a bill in leaving a blank partly filled so as to admit of a ready raising of the amount payable, these principles are aptly stated: "Can it be fairly said that the negligence of the drawer of the check or maker of the note was the proximate cause of loss to the holder? It seems to us the proximate cause of the loss is the forgery, and this the maker had no reason to anticipate. In some of the cases following Young v. Grote the rule has been invoked that, when one of two innocent persons must suffer by the wrongful act of another, he must suffer who placed it in the power of such third person to do the wrong. It seems to us such rule can have no application to this class of cases. It has never, we think, been carried to the extent of making one person civilly liable for the crime of another, and, on principle, we think it cannot be." And the following cases support these views: Scholfield v. Earl of Londesborough [1896] A. C. 514; Burrows v. Klunk, 70 Md. 451, 8 L. R. A. 576; Worrall v. Gheen, 39 Pa. 388; Holmes v. Trumper, 22 Mich. 427, 7 Am. Rep. 661; Bruce v. Westcott, 8 Barb. 874, and Wood v. Steele, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 80, 18 L. ed. 725.

These considerations make it apparent that the findings did not warrant the judgment entered thereon, and this brings us to the question as to whether the plaintiff, under the facts found, was entitled to recover to any extent. The general rule undoubtedly is, as contended for by appellant, that any material alteration in the contract avoids it, even in the hands of innocent holders, and prevents recovery upon it to any extent. But this rule has application to cases where such alteration has been made by the payee or party seeking to enforce it. By the later authorities the rule does not apply in cases where the alteration is by a stranger to the contract, and it is now the settled doctrine, in this country at least, that such an act by a stranger, without the privity of the grantee or obligee, does not avoid the contract in its entirety, even though it be without the knowledge or consent of the party to be bound, but amounts to a spoliation merely, which will not prevent a recovery upon the contract in accordance with its original terms, where those terms can be ascertained. And this is obviously upon the principle that the act of a mere interloper without the privity of the parties should not be permitted to defeat a contract to the extent that it would otherwise be valid and binding. See Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 214, where the authorities are fully collated. And an agent without authority is, in this sense, held to be a stranger to the transaction. Id. p. 217, and cases cited in note. In this case the terms of the contract, as it existed prior to its alteration, have been explicitly ascertained by the court; and, as it also appears that defendant has had the benefit of the contract actually made by her, the case is squarely within the rule which entitles the plaintiff to recover to that extent. As the facts found are sufficient to sustain a judgment such as plaintiff is entitled to recover under this rule, no new trial is necessary.

For these reasons, the order denying a new trial is affirmed; the judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment on the findings in favor of plaintiff for the foreclosure of the mortgage for the amount of principal and interest stipulated in the note as it was executed by defendant, less the amount of interest already paid; defendant to have her costs of appeal.

We concur: Harrison, J.; Garoutte, J.

v.

SANTA ANA VALLEY IRRIGATION
COMPANY, Resp't.

(.....Cal.....)

1. By-laws providing that a transfer of the stock of an irrigation company shall be made only with the land for which it was issued do not apply to a sale of delinquent stock for assessments, as the purchaser is not a transferee of the former owner of the stock.
2. The rights of a purchaser of delinquent stock sold for assessments must be determined by the general law, if no provision therefor is made by the charter or by-laws, and general provisions of a by-law as to transfer of shares of stock do not apply.

(McFarland, J., dissents.)

(February 11, 1898.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Orange County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce rights as holder of stock in the defendant corporation. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James G. Scarborough, for appellant:

The by-laws of a private corporation bind the members only by virtue of their assent, and do not affect third persons.

2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 709 and cases cited; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 500.

A corporation, by its conduct and otherwise, can waive its by-laws.

Shares of stock are, under the law, personal property, and can be transferred by their owner by indorsement and surrender of the certificate, and a corporation has no power to change this law by its by-laws, articles of incorporation, or rules.

The power to regulate the transfer of stock does not include the power to restrict such transfer.

Boisot, By-Laws of Corporations, §§ 44, 50.

Such by-law of defendant is void and of no effect for the reason that it is in restraint of trade, unreasonable and contrary to public policy.

NOTE.—As to restrictions by by-laws on the transfer of shares of stock, see New England Trust Company v. Abbott (Mass.) 27 L. R. A. 271, and note; Ireland v. Globe Milling & Reduction Co. (R. I.) 29 L. R. A. 426; Victor G. Bloede Co. v. Bloede (Md.) 88 L. R. A. 107; and Carter v. Producers' Oil Co. (Pa.) 39 L. R. A. 100.

Such by-law of defendant is void for the reason that it in effect deprives the corporation of the power of levying and enforcing assessments conferred upon it by the statute.

Eastern Pl. Road Co. v. Vaughan, 14 N. Y. 551.

The respondent by its sale of the stock to the appellant, and by receiving his money therefor, has contracted with him to deliver the shares of stock without any restrictions or limitations, and it has been frequently held that in an action involving contracts made with corporations, the latter cannot interpose as a defense that in making such contract it had exceeded the power conferred by its charter or its by-laws, or the law under which it was formed, and that in such a proceeding it is estopped from contending that it had no power to enter into the obligation.

Main v. Casserly, 67 Cal. 127, and cases cited; 2 Herman, Estoppel, §§ 1169, 1170, 1179 et seq.

Formalities prescribed in the execution of transfer may be waived by the corporation, either expressly or by implication.

23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 647, and notes.

Mr. E. E. Keech, for respondent:

In some cases the corporation owns the land and water and distributing system, and sells the land to individuals in small tracts, together with the right to a certain amount of water per acre. Frequently the corporation owns the water and delivery system, and supplies landowners at rates agreed upon or fixed in accordance with law.

In both these systems the interest of the water company is adverse to the landowner, and it has become too often an odious monopoly, in spite of the provisions of the Constitution for fixing the rates by law.

Attempts have been made to remedy this difficulty by identifying the stockholder with the landholder and rendering inseparable in law what are so in nature in this state, the land, the water, and the delivery system.

McFadden v. Los Angeles County Supers, 74 Cal. 571; Rocky Ford Canal, Reservoir Land, L. & T. Co. v. Simpson, 5 Colo. App. 30.

The water is appurtenant to the land and the corporation delivers the water to the landowner who has purchased one share of its stock for each acre of land.

The respondent was organized solely by and on behalf of the land and water owners, and not a single share of its stock has ever been sold to or owned by any other than land and water owners for whom in its articles it proposes to act as a delivery agency under the conditions named.

In Jennings v. Bank of California, 79 Cal. 323, 5 L. R. A. 283, the right to limit the transferability of stock by contract was sustained.

Woods v. Armstrong, 54 Ala. 150, 25 Am. Rep. 874; Babcock v. Goodrich, 47 Cal. 488; Pratt v. Whittier, 58 Cal. 132.

The by-laws adopted in their scope and extent do not go beyond the power in the corporation to adopt them.

McFadden v. Los Angeles County Supers. 74 Cal. 572; Knowles v. Clear Creek, P. River Mill & Ditch Co. 18 Colo. 209.

The transferee takes no rights under a sale except the statutory rights to participate in elections and receive dividends.

May v. Hanson, 6 Cal. 643, 68 Am. Dec. 135; Nevada County & S. Canal Co. v. Kidd, 37 Cal. 320.

Beatty, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this case relates to the rights of the plaintiff under a purchase of stock in the corporation defendant. A demurrer was interposed to his complaint, which was sustained by the court, and, declining to amend, final judgment was entered in favor of defendant. Plaintiff appeals, and the judgment roll constitutes the record.

The complaint seems to have been drawn, and, as we think, wisely, with the object of presenting squarely the legal questions involved in the case, and which, whether so presented or not, must necessarily be met and decided sooner or later in its progress. It appears from such complaint that defendant is a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California. Among the purposes of the corporation, as expressed in its articles of incorporation, are the following: "To deliver water for the purpose of irrigation to the owners of land in the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana, susceptible of irrigation from the waters of the Santa Ana river; said water so delivered to be taken from the south side of the Santa Ana river, at and near what is known as 'Bed Rock Canyon,' and to be delivered under the following conditions: (1) The company will act only as an agency for delivering said water to said owners, whose right to use the same is appurtenant to their said lands. (2) It will deliver water to no one who has not purchased one share of the stock of the company for each acre or fractional part thereof of irrigable land owned by him along the canal of the company, and agreed with the company that said stock shall be transferable only with the land for which it is issued, and that the water delivered shall be used only on the land for which it is issued: provided, that the company may, under such rules as the board of directors shall establish, deliver the water appurtenant to one parcel of stocked land upon other stocked land on the written consent of the owner of the first parcel, filed with the company, which consent shall not be valid for a longer term than one year; and further provided, that in case any land for which the owner has purchased stock as above specified shall become nonirrigable for any reason, and the owner thereof shall file with the company, and record in the office of the county recorder of the county in which the land lies, a written disclaimer to all future rights or use of said water from said Santa Ana river, and make due proof to the satisfaction of the company that his lands are non-irrigable, the company may allow said stock to be transferred to other unstocked lands lying along the ditches of the company."

The following of the by-laws and rules of defendant are set out:

By-Law 16.

Shares of stock in this company shall not be transferable except with the land for which it is issued, and a conveyance of the land shall legalize a transfer of the stock to the purchaser. Each subscriber of the stock of this company shall be required to purchase one share of the stock for each acre of land owned by him and located under the canals of the company, and the stock shall not be issued either in a greater or less quantity than one share per acre, or fractional part thereof, of irrigable land.

By-Law 21.

Water shall be distributed for irrigating purposes from the main canals of the corporation in such manner as shall be most equitable and just to all parties interested therein, and, other things being equal, in regular rotation to all gates on said canal; always providing that no water be distributed except to stockholders, and that no water shall be sold by the company or furnished to any stockholder to be run on land not covered by stock.

Rules.

No stockholder shall be allowed to receive water or make use of his or her water stock until a certificate of stock has been issued, and the stock books of the company signed. Passed December 27, 1891.

The water appurtenant to one parcel of stocked land may be delivered upon another parcel of stocked land, unless otherwise ordered by the board, upon the filing of a written order from the owner of the first parcel of land, and the owner of the stock located thereon, with the secretary of the company, at least forty-eight (48) hours prior to the time of the delivery of the water. Passed May 2, 1892.

Each of the certificates of stock issued by defendant, after setting forth date, number, name of stockholder, number of shares, etc., contained the following words: "Transferable on the books of the company by indorsement hereon and surrender of this certificate, and on purchase by the transferee of the land covered by this certificate. The land covered by this certificate is described as follows, to wit." Here follows in each certificate description of land owned by the party named in the certificate, or by his grantee.

In 1891, and again in 1892, defendant levied in due form certain assessments upon its capital stock, which assessments becoming delinquent the stock was sold and the plaintiff became the purchaser thereof, viz., the purchaser of the shares of sundry of the stockholders, aggregating, say, forty shares of the capital stock of defendant. These sales are shown by apt averment to have been regular in form, and sufficient in law to pass the title to such shares, so far as under the provisions of the articles of incorporation and by-laws of defendant and the laws of California might be done by such sale. Thereupon plaintiff applied to defendant, and demanded that certificates of stock issue to him for the shares by him so purchased, but without the clause, "Transferable on the books of the company by indorsement hereon and surrender of this certificate, and on purchase by the transferee of the land covered by this certificate," followed by a description of the land so covered. The defendant refused to deliver to plaintiff the certificates, without the above clause and description of the land being incorporated therein, but was ready and willing to issue to him such certificates with said clause inserted. Neither plaintiff nor defendant owned any of the lands described in the certificates representing the shares by him purchased. Plaintiff also demanded that defendant furnish to him water from its ditch, to irrigate land by him owned in the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana, along or near the water ditches of defendant, and susceptible of irrigation therefrom, and from the waters of the Santa Ana river. The water so demanded was that to which the plaintiff claimed to be entitled by virtue of his purchase of forty shares of stock in the defendant company aforesaid, and, if procured, was not to be used upon any of the land described in the certificates representing said stock so purchased. Plaintiff offered to pay all costs and expenses of delivering the water as fixed by defendant. Defendant refused to deliver the water to plaintiff.

Defendant's demurrer was both general, for want of facts, and special upon various grounds. As to all the special grounds set forth it was overruled, and it was sustained upon the sole ground that the facts alleged did not constitute a cause of action. This ruling was erroneous. Upon the facts alleged the plaintiff was entitled to certificates of stock in the form in which he demanded them; that is to say, without an indorsement which would render them valueless to him, and incapable of transfer. If the defendant could sell the stock of delinquent shareholders,—as it assumed to do,—certainly the purchaser was entitled to receive certificates for his shares in such form as would enable him to enjoy the ordinary rights of a stockholder, unless there was something in the charter or by-laws of the company inconsistent with such rights. The validity of a by-law which would abridge the ordinary rights of a purchaser of stock at a delinquent sale would certainly be open to serious question, and much of the argument of counsel has been devoted to this feature of the case. But we find it wholly unnecessary to decide whether, in any particular, the charter or by-laws of the defendant are in conflict with the laws of the state; for, as we construe them, they are entirely consistent with plaintiff's demand. The charter does not say that certificates of stock will not be issued until the subscriber or purchaser has agreed that it shall be transferable only with the land for which it is issued, etc. What it does say is that the company will deliver no water except upon the conditions named. No doubt it was contemplated in the organization of the company that stock would be issued only to such subscribers as had land of the requisite character to enable them to receive water, and that the certificates should show to what particular tracts the right to irrigate was attached. But for the case of delinquent stock sold for assessments no provision was made, either expressly or by implication, in the charter or in the by-laws, and therefore the rights of a purchaser at such sale must be determined by the general law. Under that law he has a right to receive certificates for the shares he has purchased, and to come into the corporation as a shareholder on the same footing with the other shareholders. If shares are issued to him without the special indorsement insisted upon in this case by the defendant, he is put upon the same footing with other shareholders, and that without any injury to the company or infringement of its by-laws. He is not, by virtue of the mere issuance of the shares, entitled to receive any water, and the company is not compelled to deliver any water at any time or place or in any manner inconsistent with its charter or rules. Like an original subscriber, he must become the owner of land within the district designated in the charter and in other respects conforming to its conditions. When he has acquired such land he may then, with the consent of the company,—which it would have no right unreasonably to withhold,—have his shares ascribed to such land by indorsement on the certificate, or in any other convenient method.

The company, by its act in selling the delinquent stock, and the original holder, by violation of the condition upon which he held it, have effectually severed the connection between the stock in question here and the land to which it was originally ascribed, and there is nothing in the charter or by-laws to prevent its assignment to other lands of like character within the proper district, as may be done in the analogous case expressly provided for in the charter. Until this is done, it is no disadvantage to the corporation or its other stockholders that these shares should be held in a form that will enable the plaintiff to use them or transfer them. As they do not now, and never can, oblige the company to deliver water to the plaintiff or any assignee until they are ascribed to land of the requisite character, there is no reason why they should not be issued in a form admitting of their free assignment. Until so ascribed, they do not come within either the letter or the spirit of by-law No. 16, which, like the other by-laws, relates only to voluntary transfers by shareholders, and has no application to a transfer effected by the corporation itself through the medium of a delinquent sale. The purchaser at a delinquent sale is the transferee, not of the former owner of the stock, but of the corporation itself. He comes in on the footing of an original subscriber; at least he can claim from the corporation all the privileges of a subscriber, so far as necessary to enable him to enjoy the fruits of his purchase. In this case the plaintiff shows that he is the owner of land of the requisite quantity, location, and character upon which to locate this stock, and we can perceive no reason why he should not have the stock, and, if he demands it, have it located. It is certainly a strange position for the defendant to take to claim that its vendee has no title to the stock it has sold him, or to claim that he has only such a title as will make him liable for assessments without any right to the only dividends that the company makes, i. e., water furnished for irrigation.

The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the superior court to overrule the demurrer.

I concur: Van Fleet, J.

Temple, J., concurring:

I concur in the judgment, but I am not willing, even by silence, to seem to assent to the proposition that the stock of a corporation can be made exempt from execution, and practically unassessable, by any possible by-laws. If the position of respondent be sustained, that has been accomplished. By this scheme the water rate is not made appurtenant to the several tracts of land, but the corporation stock is thus converted into an appurtenance. Make one of the tracts a homestead, and the stock becomes at once exempt from execution, and the corporation can no longer collect assessments in the statutory mode. I do not dispute the proposition that one who purchases stock is bound by the articles and also by the by-laws of the corporation, but in this state, where corporations are formed under general laws, such laws are themselves part and parcel of the charter of the corporation, and as such are beyond the control of the corporations. They can make no by-laws which conflict with or displace these. These laws expressly make stock subject to execution for the debts of the stockholder, and authorize the directors to levy assessments. The law also provides the mode in which the assessment may be enforced by sale, and expressly declares the effect of the sale. Creditors of the corporation have an interest in this power, and may sometimes compel the corporation to exercise it. It cannot be waived or destroyed by anything in the by-laws, or by any contract between the stockholders. Corporations may be formed for any purpose for which men may lawfully associate themselves, but men cannot, by any association or contract between themselves, make their property exempt from execution. If people will conduct their business by means of corporations, they must hold their corporate property and conduct such business under the corporation laws of the state. In spite of all they can do, such laws will constitute their corporate charters. It is not necessary to say what rights the purchaser will acquire under the sale, but I think it plain that he cannot be held to be a stockholder, and liable to assessment, and still be deprived of all profits as a stockholder, nor can he be compelled to purchase any particular piece of land to get such benefit. Under the claim of respondent, if the former owner of the stock has put a homestead on his land, the corporation could not sell the land to collect the assessment, and he need not concern himself as to the ownership of the stock if the right to the use of the water has become an appurtenance to the land. And, if it has not become an appurtenance, and the result is simply that the water can be used nowhere else, he is not much worse off, for the stock is worthless to anyone else, and, if not in law inalienable, has become unsalable. Such a scheme, in my opinion, is against public policy as declared in the statutes concerning corporations.

I concur: Henshaw, J.

McFarland, J., dissenting:

I dissent, and think that the judgment should be affirmed. There is nothing in the articles of incorporation or the by-laws that is unconstitutional, in conflict with general laws, or for any reason invalid; and, in my opinion, the charter and by-laws clearly provide that there shall be no ownership of shares of stock in gross; that is, an independent ownership attached to the person, and not by virtue of ownership of specific land. By-laws bind the company—the body corporate—as well as the stockholders; and the corporation cannot sever the shares of stock from the land described in them by the device of a sale for assessments any more effectively than it could do so in any other way. It could collect assessments by suit, but, if it undertakes to dispose of the shares assessed at forced sale, the purchaser takes them impressed with the character given them by the charter and by laws; and if, with that character, they are not valuable to him, he has simply made a bad bargain with his eyes open.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

v.

Louis A. FRALEIGH et al.

(..... Fla.)

*1. Where the instrument creating a trust empowers a trustee to resign after acceptance, a resignation in the manner pointed out by such instrument will be valid.

2. An instrument of writing, by which one named as trustee in a trust deed, after reciting that he was holding in trust certain lands, etc., for certain named beneficiaries, more fully set forth and described in the deed creating the trust, did thereby resign and relinquish said trusteeship, as by the provisions of said trust deed he claimed the right and authority to do, is a resignation of a trust already accepted, and not a refusal to accept the trust.

3. Under a power given to a wife to appoint and choose by her writing under her seal, another trustee instead of the one named in a trust deed executed by her husband conveying real and personal property in trust for the wife and her children, whenever the named trustee should wish to resign his trust, or should die leaving the same unfulfilled, the wife has authority to appoint her husband to be such trustee upon the resignation of the one named. The husband's acceptance of such appointment binds him to execute the trust according to its terms, and he thereby becomes invested with the same powers, and is subject to the same responsibilities, as other trustees; and the wife is entitled to the same protection against him in equity as any other cestui que trust.

4. By the common law a married woman may, without the concurrence of her husband, execute a power, whether given to her while sole or married; and she can execute such power in favor of her husband.

5. The power to appoint a trustee upon certain contingencies, invested in a married woman by a deed conveying property to a trustee for the benefit of the married woman and her children, may be executed by the married woman without her husband's concurrence, and without the formalities required by our statutes regulating married women's conveyances, as such statutes have no reference to the execution of powers, but only to conveyances of the married woman's property. The execution of such power in the manner prescribed by the trust deed will be sufficient.

6. Where real property is conveyed in trust, with power to the trustee to sell same, and with authority to the named trustee to resign, and power to a beneficiary to "appoint . . . another trustee instead of the" one originally named, the trustee so appointed taking the trusteeship subject to the trusts limited in the trust deed, and the substituted trustee sells and conveys the real property in accordance with the power contained in the trust deed, the purchaser will thereby acquire the legal title, although the resigning trustee failed to convey the trust property to his successor.

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court of Gadsden County in favor of plaintiffs in a suit to set aside a conveyance alleged to be in violation of the terms of a deed of trust and to appoint a new trustee for the property. Modified.

Statement by CARTER, J.:

On June 4, 1890, appellees filed their bill in equity in the circuit court of Gadsden county, making appellant and one Mary A. Fraleigh defendants thereto. An amended bill was filed by appellees April 16, 1891, whereby it was alleged that on January 18, 1864, Emanuel M. Fraleigh, husband of defendant Mary A. Fraleigh, executed a trust deed of conveyance to one Samuel B. Love, a certified copy of which was made a part of the bill. The deed referred to purported to be made for and in consideration of the great love and affection which the grantor bore towards his wife Mary A. Fraleigh and his children, Lillie C., Cornelia M., and Clara W. Fraleigh, as well as in consideration of the sum of $10 to the grantor paid; and it conveyed to Samuel B. Love, his heirs and assigns, certain real and personal property in Gadsden county, therein described. The deed contained the following provisions: "To have and to hold the afore-granted property to the said S. B. Love, his heirs and assigns, in trust, nevertheless, for the sole use of the said Mary A. Fraleigh, wife of the said E. M. Fraleigh, for and during her natural life, and after death to such children as she may have living at the time of her death, share and share alike, with power to the said Samuel B. Love to sell any portion of said trust estate, and to reinvest the proceeds in such other property, subject to the above-described trust, as he shall deem most for the interest of said trust estate, with power to the said Mary A. Fraleigh to appoint and choose, by her writing under her seal, another trustee instead of the said Samuel B. Love, whenever the said Samuel B. Love shall wish to resign said trust, or shall die leaving the same unfulfilled; said trustee so appointed taking said trusteeship subject to the trust herein limited."

It was further shown by the amended bill that on May 23, 1866, Samuel B. Love executed under seal, and in the presence of two subscribing witnesses, an instrument in writing, whereby, after reciting that said Love was holding in trust certain lands, etc., for Mary A. Fraleigh and her children, more fully set forth and described in the trust deed above described, he did thereby resign and relinquish said trusteeship, as by the provisions of said trust deed he claimed the right and authority to do; and on the same day Mary A. Fraleigh executed under seal, and in the presence of two subscribing witnesses, an instrument in writing, whereby, after reciting the trust deed before referred to, and its provision empowering her to appoint or choose another trustee whenever the said Love wished to resign, and that said Love had resigned the trusteeship, leaving same unfulfilled, she did, by virtue of the authority vested in her by said trust deed, constitute and appoint E. M. Fraleigh trustee in lieu of said Love. Each of these instruments was proved by a subscribing witness, and recorded in the clerk's office of Gadsden county on August 28, 1866.

It was further alleged by said amended bill that appellant was in possession of certain lands described in the trust deed, claiming title to same by virtue of a deed from one Samuel Hamblin, who received deeds to said lands from Mary A. and E. M. Fraleigh (the latter pretending to execute said deeds as trustee), dated January 20, 1874; that the property embraced in said deed had "run down" and was "going to waste," and that appellees had received no benefits, rents, or profits therefrom since the date of said deed to Hamblin; that appellant and Samuel Hamblin combined and confederated with E. M. Fraleigh and other persons to destroy the force and effect of the trust deed, and to deprive appellees of all benefits that might arise from the proper control and management of the property, in order that appellant might obtain title thereto and possession thereof and that the title passed to the said Samuel Hamblin for little or no consideration; that the proceeds of the sale were not reinvested as required by the trust deed, and that appellant knew that fact; that the appointment of Emanuel M. Fraleigh as trustee was unauthorized, null and void, the said Mary A. Fraleigh being under coverture, the wife of said E. M. Fraleigh, at the time of making such appointment; that the deeds made by virtue of said appointment, by E. M. Fraleigh, pretended trustee, and the said Mary A. Fraleigh, to Samuel Hamblin, and the one from Hamblin to appellant, passed no title, and were null and void.

It was further alleged that Samuel B. Love and E. M. Fraleigh were dead; that appellees Louis A., Albert E., Lillie F., Alliene, and Emily were the only surviving children of Mary A. Fraleigh, and were all over twenty-one years of age, except Alliene and Emily, who were about twenty years of age. The consideration expressed in the deeds from Fraleigh and wife to Hamblin was $700.

The bill prayed that the appointment of E. M. Fraleigh to be trustee, the deeds to Samuel Hamblin, and the deed to appellant be declared illegal, null, and void; that appellant be required to produce the deeds in court for cancellation; that a trustee be appointed, vice Samuel B. Love, deceased,—and for general relief.

The separate answer of appellant to the amended bill of complaint filed May 19, 1891, admitted the execution of the trust deed by E. M. Fraleigh; the appointment of E. M. Fraleigh to be trustee by Mary A. Fraleigh; the resignation of S. B. Love as trustee; that appellant was in possession of certain land described in the trust deed, and claimed same under a deed from Samuel Hamblin, who acquired title to same by deeds from Mary A. Fraleigh and Emanuel M. Fraleigh, as trustee,—and denied that the property had run down or was going to waste, that the lands passed to Hamblin for little or no consideration, that the proceeds of sale were not reinvested as required by the trust deed, and that appellant knew that fact.

Appellant by his answer also denied all charges of combination and confederacy made against him in the bill, and alleged that he purchased the lands mentioned in the bill from Samuel Hamblin in March, 1878, in good faith, and without notice of any equities claimed by appellees, paying therefor the sum of $1,500.

The case was set down for hearing on amended bill and answer of appellant, and on November 4, 1893, a decree was rendered whereby it was decreed that the appointment of E. M. Fraleigh to be trustee, by Mary A. Fraleigh, his wife, was illegal, null, and utterly void; that the deeds from E. M. Fraleigh, as trustee, and his wife, Mary A. Fraleigh, to Samuel Hamblin, passed whatever right, title or interest Mary A. Fraleigh might have had in the property attempted to be thereby conveyed, but did not pass any right, title, or interest of the children of Mary A. Fraleigh, and as to such children the deeds were absolutely null, void, and of no effect whatever; that the deed from Hamblin to appellant passed no title whatever to any lands embraced in the original trust deed, except the interest or estate which Mary A. Fraleigh had therein, and which she might have conveyed to Samuel Hamblin in the deeds to him before mentioned, and that for any other purpose, or to any other extent, the said deed from Hamblin to appellant was utterly null, void, and of no effect; that D. McMillan be, and he was thereby, appointed trustee, to take charge of, recover, and manage the lands described in the trust deed from Fraleigh to Love, so far as the interest and estate of the children of Mary A. Fraleigh extended, subject to the same trust and powers as mentioned in the original trust deed in respect to said children. From this decree Stearns entered his appeal on March 24, 1894, to our June term, 1894, claiming in his petition of appeal that the court erred in decreeing (1) that the appointment of E. M. Fraleigh as trustee, by his wife, was illegal and void; (2) that the deeds from Fraleigh, trustee, and his wife, to Samuel Hamblin, did not pass to Hamblin any right or interest of Mary A. Fraleigh's children, but that as to them the deeds were absolutely null and void; (3) that the deed from Hamblin to appellant passed only the interest of Mary A. Fraleigh in the lands conveyed, and to any further extent was null and void; (4) the appointment of D. McMillan to be trustee.

Mr. Fred. T. Myers, for appellant:

There is certainly no legal obstacle to a husband being appointed trustee of his wife's separate estate by a third person. In fact where there is a separate estate created for the benefit of the wife, and no trustee is named in the instrument creating it, the husband, by the common law, becomes the legal owner of the property, charged in equity with the trust to hold it for the separate use of the wife.

When the husband is the trustee, the wife has the same remedies against him for the protection of her estate that she would have against a stranger acting as trustee.

1 Bishop, Married Women, § 801; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1380; Walker v. Beat, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 753, 19 L. ed. 818.

Why cannot the wife exercise the unlimited power of appointment given her in the instrument, by selecting her husband as trustee in lieu of him who resigned?

Waterman v. Higgins, 28 Fla. 660.

There is no contractual quality in the act of appointment. The contractual relations were created and established at the execution of the trust deed, and the unrestricted power of appointment was there given. The act of appointment is simply the nomination of the person to execute the trusts created by the original instrument; and the conjugal relation does not forbid, as we have seen, the relationship of trustee and cestui que trust between husband and wife.

Tweedy v. Urquhart, 30 Ga. 446; 1 Perry, Tr. § 296.

If the appointment was valid then, under the power conferred on the trustee by the deed of trust, the trustee, Fraleigh, had full authority to sell to Hamblin.

2 Perry, Tr. § 764.

This is not a case where the purchaser would be held to see to a proper application of the proceeds of sale.

Mr. W. H. Ellis for appellees.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant having failed to argue the fourth error assigned in the petition of appeal, we treat it as abandoned. The principal question involved by the other assignments is whether the appointment of E. M. Fraleigh to be trustee, by his wife, under the power of appointment given her by the terms of the trust deed, was a valid act. If so, and the deeds to Hamblin passed title, the appellant, being a purchaser for value from him, without notice of any equities claimed by appellees, would obtain a good title. Saunders v. Richard, 35 Fla. 28. The hearing in the court below was upon bill and answer, and it will be observed that the answer denied that the sale to Hamblin was for little or no consideration, that the proceeds of the sale had not been reinvested, and all charges of fraud and conspiracy on the part of appellant to obtain title to the property. The deeds to Hamblin expressed a consideration of $700, and, in the absence of actual notice, the appellant could only be charged with constructive notice to the extent of that furnished by the record of the trust deed, and of those to Hamblin.

It is insisted by appellees that the appointment of E. M. Fraleigh to be trustee was void, because—First, the trustee, Love, could not, after having accepted the trust, resign or renounce it; second, a married woman cannot appoint her husband trustee of a trust created by him for the benefit of herself and children; third, the execution of the instrument of appointment was not joined in by Mrs. Fraleigh's husband, nor did she acknowledge its execution separate and apart from her husband.

1. The general rule, that a trustee cannot, after having accepted a trust, resign or renounce it at his pleasure, contended for by appellees, is unquestionably correct; but it is equally true that, where the instrument creating the trust empowers a trustee to resign after acceptance, a resignation in the manner pointed out by such instrument will be valid. 1 Perry, Tr. § 274; 2 Lewin, Tr. *646; Tiffany & Bullard, Trusts & Trustees, p. 536. It is not denied that the trust deed authorized Mr. Love to resign, nor that his resignation was in strict accordance with the authority; but the appellees ask us to construe the written resignation as a refusal to accept the trust, and it is insisted that Mrs. Fraleigh had no authority to appoint another trustee in case of Mr. Love's refusal to accept the trust, but only in the event of his resignation. The instrument expressly recites the fact that Mr. Love was holding property in trust, and it referred to the trust deed for a description of the property so held and to its provisions authorizing him to resign. If he was holding the property in trust, as declared by this instrument, he had accepted the trusteeship, and the instrument was what it purported to be,—a resignation of the trust, and not a refusal to accept it.

2. It is argued by appellees that the appointment of E. M. Fraleigh as trustee of a trust created by him for his wife and children would defeat the object of the trust, and his acceptance would amount to a revocation thereof; and we are referred to the case of Robinson v. Dart, Dud. Eq. 128, 31 Am. Dec. 569, and to the cases of Richards v. Chambers, 10 Ves. Jr. 580; Magwood v. Johnston, 1 Hill, Eq. 228, and Ewing v. Smith, 3 Desauss. Eq. 417, 5 Am. Dec. 557, cited therein, as sustaining this proposition. The last two cases have no reference to the question under consideration. The case of Richards v. Chambers, 10 Ves. Jr. 580, as quoted in the first-named case, would go far towards sustaining the contention of appellees, but a reference to the official report of the case shows that it sustains the contrary view. There the property, by a marriage settlement, was secured to the sole and separate use of the wife for life, and, if she survived her husband, to her absolutely; but, if she died before her husband, it was to go to such persons as she by will or deed might appoint, and, in default of appointment, to her executors or administrators. The husband and wife by petition applied to have a part of the trust property then in court transferred to them; the wife having executed an appointment in favor of the husband, and expressed a desire, upon an examination de bene esse, that the petition be granted. The court said: "The wife, having a separate estate for life, might, according to the doctrine of many cases, part with that life interest. She might also execute an appointment in favor of her husband, or of any person, which appointment in the event of her death in his life would be a valuable and effectual disposition of the property. But the question . . . is, whether the contingent interest which the wife, while sui juris has secured to herself in the event of her surviving her husband, can, through the interposition of this court, be given up by her while in a state of coverture." The question in that case was as to a contingent interest, over which the wife had no power of appointment by contract; and the proposition was distinctly recognized that she could exercise a power of appointment, even in favor of her husband. In Robinson v. Dart, Dud. Eq. 128, 81 Am. Dec. 569, application was made to a court of equity to appoint a husband trustee for his wife. The court declined to appoint him, or to direct that the wife's separate property be turned over to him; holding, not that he was incompetent or disqualified, but that he was an improper person to whom to commit the trusteeship. The reasons advanced by the court were that, if appointed, he would be constantly tempted to use the authority and influence of a husband to assume the disposal of the property to his own uses, and induce his wife's acquiescence, and that a court of equity should not place a wife in such a situation that she might be compelled to go into equity to call her husband to account for breaches of his duty as trustee. To the same effect, see Boykin v. Cipiles, 2 Hill, Eq. 200, 29 Am. Dec. 67; Ex parte Hunter, Rice, Eq. 293; Dean v. Lanford, 9 Rich. Eq. 423.

In none of the cases referred to by appellees was any question involved as to whether, under a power to appoint new trustees, a married woman could appoint her husband; nor was it held that a husband was incompetent or disqualified to be a trustee for his wife. There is a very clear and obvious distinction between the incompetency and the unfitness of a person for the position of trustee, and between the power of an individual to select a trustee, and the duty of a court in appointing one. Forster v. Abraham, L. R. 17 Eq. 851. The general rule is that any person may be appointed a trustee who is capable of confidence, of holding real and personal property, and of executing the trust. 3 Kerr, Real Prop. § 1728; 1 Perry, Tr. § 89; Tiffany & Bullard, Trusts & Trustees, 325. It is not denied that the husband in this case was capable of everything required by the general definition, and that he was in fact a competent trustee for his children under the same deed. Then why not for his wife? In equity he has been frequently held to be a trustee for his wife, and prior to any recent statutes regulating married women's property, in all cases where real estate was conveyed direct to the wife during coverture, for her sole and separate use, exclusive of her husband, he was in equity deemed a trustee for the wife, and as such held the legal title. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1380; 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 800; Porter v. Bank of Rutland, 19 Vt. 410; Bennet v. Davis, 2 P. Wms. 816; Conway v. Hale, 4 Hayw. (Tenn.) 1, 9 Am. Dec. 748; Walker v. Beal, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 743, 19 L. ed. 814. And where an estate was given to, or engaged to be held by, a husband, for the use of his wife, the husband was thereby constituted a trustee for the separate use of the wife. Darley v. Darley, 3 Atk. 399; M'Lean v. Longlands, 5 Ves. Jr. 71; Rich v. Cockell, 9 Ves. Jr. 369; Walter v. Hodge, 2 Swanst. 92; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1872. While a court of equity, perhaps, would never have appointed Mr. Fraleigh to be trustee of the trust created by him for his wife and children, and would probably have removed him from the position, upon proper application, after he was appointed, yet there is no absolute rule of law rendering him incompetent to act in that capacity, if appointed by authority of the instrument creating the trust, or in any other legal manner. 1 Perry, Tr. § 59; 1 Lewin, Tr. *41. Neither did the appointment of Mr. Fraleigh, and his acceptance thereof, revoke the trust deed. On the contrary, his acceptance bound him to execute the trust according to its terms; and he was invested with the same power, and subject to the same responsibilities, as other trustees, and the wife was entitled to the same protection in equity as any other cestui que trust. 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 801; Walker v. Beal, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 743, 19 L. ed. 814; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1380; Tweedy v. Urquhart, 30 Ga. 446. In this latter case, by an antenuptial settlement between Ephraim Tweedy and Isabella Hadley, made in contemplation of marriage, certain personal property was conveyed to a trustee for the sole use of Isabella, "separate from and wholly free from the control of her intended husband, or any future husband," with a provision authorizing Isabella to appoint any other person trustee in the place of the one named in the deed, should he die or resign. The trustee having resigned, Isabella, then the wife of Tweedy, appointed her husband trustee, in accordance with the power contained in the deed. The court held that there was nothing in the relation of husband and wife, nor in the clause of the settlement in quotation above, depriving the wife of the right to appoint her husband trustee, under the power reserved in the settlement, and that his appointment was valid.

8. At common law a married woman could, without the concurrence of her husband, execute a power, whether the power was given to her while sole or married. 4 Kent, Com. *324; Gridley v. Wynant, 64 U. S. 28 How. 500, 16 L. ed. 411; Gridley v. Westbrook, 64 U. S. 503, 16 L. ed. 412; Armstrong v. Kerns, 61 Md. 364; Thompson v. Perry, 2 Hill, Eq. 204, 29 Am. Dec. 68; Burnes v. Irwin, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 199, 1 L. ed. 348. And she could, in such cases, execute the power in favor of her husband. Wood v. Wood, L. R. 10 Eq. 220; Taylor v. Eastman, 92 N. C. 601; 8 Kerr, Real Prop. §§ 1857, 1859; Richards v. Chambers, 10 Ves. Jr. 580. As the appointment of a trustee in this case was the exercise of a mere power, and at common law a married woman could exercise such power without the assent of her husband, it only remains to be seen whether this rule of the common law had been changed by any statute of this state at the time of the execution of the power in question in this case. We are very clearly of the opinion that it had not. The statutes in force at that time requiring the joinder of the husband, and a separate acknowledgment of the wife, were applicable only to transfers and conveyances of the wife's property. Act Feb. 4, 1835, § 1; Act March 6, 1845, § 4.

The designation of a person to act as trustee, and hold the legal title to property of which she was a beneficiary, was not a transfer by her of the trust property, or any interest therein. Her appointment conferred no title upon her husband in the trust property. His title, powers, and duties were derived from, and determined by, the original trust deed, not from her appointment. Her power to appoint possessed none of the elements of an estate. Norfleet v. Hawkins, 98 N. C. 392; 4 Kent, Com. 337; Patterson v. Lawrence, 83 Ga. 708, 7 L. R. A. 148; Schley v. McCeney, 36 Md. 266; 3 Kerr, Real Prop. §§ 1850, 1851; Cranston v. Crane, 97 Mass. 459, 93 Am. Dec. 106.

4. It is also insisted that the substituted trustee acquired no title to the property which he could convey without a deed from the retiring trustee. The trust deed authorized the named trustee to resign. He did resign, and thereupon ceased to be trustee. Mrs. Fraleigh was authorized to choose and appoint another. She did so, and thereupon E. M. Fraleigh, by the express language of the trust deed, took the trusteeship, subject to the trust in the deed limited. Even if the trust property was not, by the language of the trust deed, effectually transferred to the new trustee upon his appointment, without a formal conveyance from Mr. Love, yet by his appointment Mr. Fraleigh became the rightful trustee, and as such could unquestionably have maintained actions against Mr. Love for conveyances and possession of the trust property. Noble v. Meymott, 14 Beav. 471; 2 Lewin, Tr. *650. If the language of the trust deed was insufficient to vest title to the trust property in Mr. Fraleigh, but was sufficient to constitute him a trustee upon Mrs. Fraleigh's appointment, then the legal title remained in Mr. Love, as a naked trust; and, upon the execution of the power of sale contained in the trust deed by the new trustee, the title passed to the purchaser (at least, so far as the cestui que trustent were concerned), by force of the terms of the trust deed granting power to sell, and by the deed of the new trustee executed under that power. National Webster Bank v. Eldridge, 115 Mass. 424.

The decree of the Circuit Court, except the paragraph appointing D. McMillan as trustee, is reversed, with directions to dismiss the bill and amended bill, as against the appellant. In other respects the decree is affirmed.

STATE of Georgia.

(.....Ga.....)

"Inasmuch as there can be no doubt that the words 'domestic animals,' as used in that clause of the Constitution authorizing the general assembly to 'impose a tax upon such domestic animals as, from their nature and habits, are destructive of other property,' were intended to refer to dogs, it follows inevitably that the dog is classed by the fundamental law of the state as 'a domestic animal;' and therefore an act of cruelty to a dog is indictable under § 703 of the Penal Code.

Messrs. Cutts & Lawson for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Tom Eason, Solicitor General, and M. E. Land for the State.

Fish, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An accusation in the county court of Wilcox county charged B. F. Wilcox with the offense of cruelty to a domestic animal, under § 703 of the Penal Code, which provides that "every person who shall instigate, engage in, or do anything in furtherance of an act of cruelty to a domestic animal, shall be punished as for a misdemeanor." The animal alleged to have been cruelly treated was a dog. The accused demurred to the accusation on the ground that a dog is not a domestic animal. The demurrer was overruled, and this ruling was sustained upon certiorari, whereupon the accused excepted. The sole question made, therefore, is whether a dog is a domestic animal. There is some conflict in the decisions of the courts of different states on the subject, but the decided weight of authority seems to be that a dog is a domestic animal. Some of the leading cases so holding are State v. McDuffie, 34 N. H. 526, 69 Am. Dec. 516; Hurley v. State, 30 Tex. App. 333; State v. Giles, 125 Ind. 124; Dodson v. Mock, 20 N. C. (4 Dev. & B. L.) 146; and Shaw v. Croft, 37 Fed. Rep. 317. The case of Patton v. State, 93 Ga. 111, is cited by counsel for plaintiff in error as authority that a dog is not a domestic animal. The sole question decided in that case was that § 729 of the Penal Code, which is in these words: "All other acts of wilful and malicious mischief, in the injuring or destroying any other public or private property not herein enumerated, shall be misdemeanors"—does not apply to injuring or killing animals of any kind, and therefore the wilful and malicious killing of a dog was not an indictable offense under that section. The discussion by Justice Lumpkin in that case as to whether or not a dog was property, while quite interesting, was not necessary for the determination of the questions as ruled. This court, in Graham v. Smith (decided at the last term) 28 S. E. 325, held that "the owner of a dog has such a property in it as will enable him to maintain an action of trover for its recovery in case of its wrongful conversion." Whatever the status of the dog may be elsewhere, we think the fundamental law of this state classifies it as "a domestic animal" in that clause of the Constitution (Civ. Code, § 5883) authorizing the general assembly to "impose a tax upon such domestic animals as, from their nature and habits, are destructive of other property." There can be no doubt that the words "domestic animals," as there used, were intended to refer to dogs, and therefore an act of cruelty to a dog is indictable under § 703 of the Penal Code, and there was no error in overruling the certiorari.

Judgment affirmed.

T. J. PEARCE.

(.....Ga.....)

"While the term 'aged,' as applied to human beings, is not, for all purposes, susceptible of precise definition, and while it is not practicable to arbitrarily fix a period of life at which the condition of being aged may be said to have certainly begun, it is safe to hold that a man sixty-six years old is entitled to an exemption of his property from levy and sale, under that clause of the Constitution (Civ. Code, § 5912) allowing this right to 'every aged or infirm person.' This is true although the applicant may be a hale and hearty man.

(May 22, 1897.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Talbot County to review a judgment refusing to set apart to plaintiff as an aged person a homestead free from execution. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. J. Bull, for plaintiff in error:

Code, § 2002, provides that every aged person shall be entitled to a homestead.

The allotted life of a man is three score years and ten (seventy) years. 90 Psalm, 10th verse.

*Headnote by FISH, J.

NOTE.—The question who is "aged" seems to be a novel one.

On the question who is a "child," see Collins v. State (Ga.) 35 L. R. A. 501.

This plaintiff only lacks four years of living his allotted time.

Webster's definition of "aged" is an old person "having lived almost to or beyond the usual time allotted to that species of beings."

Evidently the legislature intended to give a homestead to an aged person whether he is infirm or not, and the statutes make "aged" or "infirm" persons two separate and distinct grounds.

Messrs. J. H. Worrill, J. H. McGehee, and Brannon, Hatcher, & Martin for defendant in error.

Fish, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On January 11, 1895, James Allen applied to the ordinary of Talbot county for the setting apart of a homestead and exemption to himself as an aged person, alleging in his petition that he was sixty-six years of age. T. J. Pearce, a creditor of the applicant, filed an objection on the ground that Allen was not an aged person in contemplation of law. The homestead was granted, and the objector appealed to the superior court. On the trial, there, it appeared that the applicant was sixty-six years old, and that he was hale and hearty. The judge directed a verdict in favor of the objector, on the ground that the petition and evidence did not show that the applicant was entitled to a homestead. This ruling is assigned as error. It will be observed that the sole question made by this record is whether a man sixty-six years of age, though hale and hearty, is entitled to an exemption of his property from levy and sale under that clause of the Constitution (Civ. Code, § 5912) allowing this right to "every aged or infirm person." The right is to every aged or infirm person. If he be aged, he is entitled to the exemption, whether he be infirm or not. So, if he be infirm, he has the right to it, without regard to his age. It would be difficult to designate an exact period of life when one might with certainty be said to have become aged; yet there are certain ages fixed by our statutes, which, when attained, relieve a man of some of the burdens of citizenship. After he reaches the age of fifty years, he is no longer subject to road duty; and after he is sixty years old he is relieved of poll tax, and, at his option, of jury services. It has been held in an English case that persons fifty years of age are aged. Pomeroy v. Willway, L. R. 42 Ch. Div. 510. There a testator directed that the interest of a fund should forever "be divided into annuities of ten pounds each, and to be paid half-yearly, to an equal number of men and women not under fifty years of age. Unitarians, and who attend Lewin's Mead Unitarian Chapel or chapels in Bristol." The question was whether or not the gift was charitable, and it was held that persons not under fifty years of age were aged persons, within the meaning of the statute of charitable uses (43 Eliz. chap. 4), providing for gifts "for the relief of aged and impotent and poor people," and that the bequest was good as a charitable gift.

While we are not to be understood as fixing with accuracy the time when human beings become aged, yet we deem it safe to hold that a man sixty-six years old, though hale and hearty, is entitled to homestead and exemption under the above-cited constitutional provision.

Judgment reversed.

Clara F. BASS, Appt.,

v.

METROPOLITAN WEST SIDE ELEVATED RAILROAD COMPANY et al.

(53 U. S. App. 542, 82 Fed. Rep. 367.)

1. A tenant has no right to remove a building placed by him upon the leased property under a stipulation requiring him to make the erection, keep it insured and in repair, and requiring the lessor to purchase it at the expiration of the term or to renew the lease for a specified time, at the expiration of which the title should pass to the lessor, and it is immaterial that a lien is reserved in favor of the lessor to enforce performance of the lessee's covenants.
2. The lessor's agreement to the erection of a building upon the leased premises which varies from that called for by the lease will prevent his subsequently enforcing the specifications of the contract.
3. A tenant who has covenanted to erect and keep in repair a building on the leased premises cannot by improving one part of it acquire the right to destroy another part.
4. Injunction will not be refused to prevent the destruction of a portion of a building because it is small and insignificant in comparison with the space that remains.
5. The right to remove a portion of a leased building for the occupation of its tracks is not acquired by a railroad company without condemnation proceedings by purchasing the leasehold with the assent of the lessor, although the building was erected by the tenant under a stipulation in the lease which required the lessor to make him certain compensation for it at the expiration of the lease.
6. Injunction may issue to compel the restoration by a railroad company of a portion of a building on a leasehold which has been acquired by it, and which, without making compensation therefor, it has removed to make space for the laying of its tracks.

(October 20, 1897.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois dismissing a bill to enjoin defendants from occupying and using certain real estate belonging to her for railroad purposes. Reversed.

Before Woods and Jenkins, Circuit Judges, and Grosceup, District Judge.

Statement by Woods, Circuit Judge:

This appeal is from a decree dismissing a bill for an injunction against the occupation and use for railroad purposes of real estate in Chicago, between Van Buren and Jackson streets, fronting to the east on Market street, and extending to the Chicago river on the west, described as lot 10 in the subdivision of lots 2, 3, and 4 in block 84, school section addition to Chicago. The essential facts, as shown by the bill, answer, and proofs are these:

NOTE.—As to mandatory injunction, see note to Moundville v. Ohio River R. Co. (W. Va.) 20 L. R. A. 161; also Central Trust Co. v. Moran (Minn.) 29 L. R. A. 212.

In 1888, the appellant, Clara F. Bass, leased the premises to John P. Altgeld for the term of ninety years, at an annual rental of $2,500 for the first five years, and of $2,750 for the next five years, and thereafter of 5 per centum of the "fair salable value of the leased premises, exclusive of the building or buildings," to be ascertained by appraisalment on July 1, 1898, and every succeeding tenth year, but at no time to be less than $2,750 per annum; the tenant paying all taxes, rates, charges, and assessments, and maintaining in good repair buildings and improvements. Of the numerous provisions and covenants in the lease, binding upon or for the benefit of the respective parties, their heirs, representatives, or assigns, those especially pertinent to the present discussion are, in substance, the following: The tenant shall forthwith erect on the premises "a good and substantial building of brick, stone, and such other material as is commonly used on the outside and in the inside of first-class mercantile buildings, the foundations and walls to be sufficiently strong to support a building eight stories high, and the building to be at least seven full stories in height above the grade of the street, and to cost not less than the sum of $50,000, according to designs, plans, and specifications, to be approved in writing by the lessor, . . . and in accordance with the building ordinances of the city of Chicago, covering the entire premises aforesaid." The tenant shall keep the building insured for three fourths of its value, and, in case of destruction or damage by fire, "shall rebuild or repair the same upon designs, plans, and specifications to be approved by the said party of the first part, . . . so that the building shall entirely cover said premises, and shall be at least seven full stories in height above the grade of the street, also of such materials and with such foundations and walls as shall be approved by said party of the first part, . . . to cost not less than $35,000, exclusive of foundations, and have the same rebuilt and ready for occupancy within eighteen months from such loss and destruction;" and in case of failure to rebuild, all insurance money shall belong to the lessor. In the event of the determination of the lease before the expiration of the term for breach of any covenant herein, the building, fixtures, and improvements on the premises shall be forfeited to and become the property of the owner of the fee, "without any compensation therefor" to the tenant. At the end of the term of ninety years the owner of the fee shall either purchase the building, fixtures, and improvements on the premises, paying 60 per cent of their cash value, as determined by an appraisalment provided for, or make a new lease for forty years on the terms of the original lease, except that, in lieu of the clause for the purchase of building, it shall be provided that, if the lease expires by lapse of time or otherwise, the building or buildings with all improvements and fixtures then on the premises, shall become and be the property of the owner of the fee, without rendering any compensation therefor. The tenant shall at no time permit any part of the premises to be occupied adversely to the interest or title of the lessor. No assignment of the lease shall be made without giving the owner of the fee the option to buy the leasehold interest at the price of the proposed assignment. "In order to secure the payment of all rent due, accruing, or to accrue under this lease, and also all sums advanced or paid for taxes, duties, rates, charges, assessments, or impositions as aforesaid, or due upon any other account whatever, and for which said lessor, her heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, may be entitled to repayment hereunder, she, he, or they shall have at all times a first and valid lien upon all improvements and tenements, and the materials thereof, which may be at any time put upon the said leased premises, . . . meaning and intending hereby to give the party of the first part, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, a valid and first lien upon any and all buildings, improvements, and other property on said premises belonging to the party of the second part, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, as security for the payment of said rent in the manner aforesaid, anything hereinbefore contained to the contrary notwithstanding." A seven-story brick building was accordingly erected at a cost of more than $50,000, and covering the entire lot except a strip 5 or 6 feet wide, next to the river.

In 1894, the appellee, the Metropolitan West Side Elevated Railroad Company—a corporation organized to operate an elevated railroad in Chicago, acquired the premises adjacent to the appellant's lot on the north extending from Market street to the river, and having removed existing buildings, constructed thereon an elevated railroad upon which its trains ran, and for some months prior to the filing of the bill had been running, in their passage to and from the western division of the city. In order to connect its road with the loop elevated railroad in process of construction in the city, the Metropolitan Company found it necessary to cut away the northeast corner of the appellant's building above the first story thereof, and, in order to accomplish that end without resort to proceedings for condemnation under the statute of the state, procured an assignment to itself of the leasehold estate; Altgeld having assigned in 1889 to John J. Mitchell, who on August 29, 1895, assigned to the Metropolitan Company. These assignments were made with the consent of the appellant. Upon coming into possession and before the filing of the bill, the Metropolitan Company proceeded to cut away the northeast corner of the building above the first story, the portion removed being in the form of a prism, with three plane faces extending from the top of the building, the lines of section of the walls being 13.4 feet on the north and 12.4 feet on the east from the northeast corner of the building. A freight elevator which had been in that corner was removed, and re-erected next to the north wall at a point half way from Market street to the river. According to the plans in evidence, no supporting columns have been or will be placed upon the land of the appellant, but the portion of the first story now cut down will be crossed by a girder upon which will rest the track connecting the road of the Metropolitan Company on the north side of the premises with the road of the Union Consolidated Elevated Railroad Company in front of the premises on Market street. The Metropolitan Company is insolvent, and its road is in the hands of a receiver, the respondent and appellee Dickson and MacAllister.

The prayer of the bill is that the appellee MacAllister be enjoined from placing the proposed structure across the premises, and from running trains thereon within the lines of the lot; that the receiver be required to perform the covenants of the lease, to restore the building to the condition in which it was before the cutting off of the corner, and thereafter to maintain the same in accordance with the terms of the lease; and that, in default thereof, the lease be forfeited, and the premises surrendered to the appellant.

It is shown that the Metropolitan Company paid Mitchell for the leasehold $84,000, and, in addition expended upon the property, for necessary improvements and repairs, more than $10,000, and that in its present condition the building is a better security for the payment of rent and the performance of other covenants of the lease than it was before the Metropolitan Company took possession. The Constitution of Illinois of 1870 (art. 2, § 13) provides that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation," which, "when not made by the state, shall be ascertained by a jury, as shall be prescribed by law;" and by article 11, § 14, it is provided: "The right of trial by jury shall be held inviolate in all trials of claims for compensation, when in the exercise of the said right of eminent domain, any incorporated company shall be interested either for or against the exercise of said right." Section 2 of "an Act to Provide for the Exercise of the Right of Eminent Domain" (2 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. (Ill.) chap. 47) requires the party authorized to take or damage the property, or the railroad company which proposes to take property, to file in court "a petition, setting forth by reference his or their authority in the premises, the purpose for which said property is sought to be taken or damaged, a description of the property, the names of all persons interested therein as owners or otherwise as appearing of record, if known, or if not known stating that fact, and praying such judge to cause the compensation to be paid to the owner to be assessed. . . . Persons interested, whose names are unknown, may be made parties defendant by the description of the unknown owners;" and by § 11, provides that "any person not made a party may become such by filing his cross petition, setting forth that he is the owner or has an interest in the property, and which will be taken or damaged by the proposed work; and the rights of such last-named petitioner shall thereupon be fully considered and determined."

The opinion of the court below is in the record, but has not been reported.

Mr. Henry S. Robbins for appellant.

Messrs. John P. Wilson and W. W. Gurley, for appellees:

The railroad company being the owners of the leasehold estate and buildings upon the premises in question, and in possession of the same, has the right to devote all or any portion of said premises to railroad purposes without resorting to proceedings under the eminent domain act to acquire the interest of the lessor.

The railroad company is the judge of the necessity for the appropriation of the property.

Bowman v. Venice & C. R. Co. 102 Ill. 459; Smith v. Chicago & W. I. R. Co. 105 Ill. 511; O'Hare v. Chicago, M. & N. R. Co. 139 Ill. 151.

Where premises sought to be taken are under lease, and a portion only of the premises are taken, the tenant is not relieved from the obligation to pay the full amount of rent reserved in the lease, and, during the continuance of the lease, the landlord is entitled to no compensation for the taking of the premises, but only damages to his reversion.

Stubbings v. Evanston, 136 Ill. 37, 11 L. R. A. 889, and cases therein cited; Stetson v. Chicago & E. R. Co. 75 Ill. 74; Peoria & R. I. R. Co. v. Schertz, 84 Ill. 135; Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Heiss, 141 Ill. 85; Parker v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 146 Ill. 158; White v. Metropolitan West Side Elev. R. Co. 154 Ill. 620.

The appellant has not been damaged by the changes made in the building by the appellee, the Metropolitan West Side Elevated Railroad Company.

Any judgment for damages obtained by the appellant, on account of or by reason of the construction or operation of the railroad of the railroad company, would be a first lien upon the entire railroad property of the railroad company, superior to its mortgage indebtedness.

Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Heiss, 141 Ill. 85.

The bill of complaint in this case is a bill for specific performance, and under the rules of law governing such cases relief will not be granted as a matter of absolute right to either party, but will be given or withheld, in the discretion of the court, as the circumstances may appear.

Chicago Municipal Gaslight & Fuel Co. v. Lake, 130 Ill. 42; Willard v. Tayloe, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 557, 19 L. ed. 501; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Reno, 113 Ill. 39; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Shoeneman, 90 Ill. 258; Franz v. Orton, 75 Ill. 100.

Neither the railroad company nor its receiver has violated any of the covenants of the lease in question here.

Hawes v. Favor, 161 Ill. 440.

The alterations made in the building and the proposed construction and use of railroad tracks do not constitute waste.

Hawes v. Favor, 161 Ill. 440.

Woods, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not disputed that injunction is the proper remedy against the appropriation of land for the use of a public corporation which has not acquired a right to the proposed use either by purchase or by condemnation; and, contrary to the general rule that equitable relief is granted only when equitable considerations require it, the injunction in such cases may be and perhaps more frequently than otherwise is, sought in vindication of a purely legal right; and, if the technical right and a threatened infringement of it be established, the relief will be granted without inquiry into the general equities of the case. By this we do not mean that a specific equity, like an estoppel, may not be a defense to such a suit; but, if a complete defense be not shown, the court will not refuse the relief on grounds of equitable discretion, as it might do in a suit for specific performance or rescission or other cause involving no special constitutional or statutory right of such a nature as to be capable of vindication or enforcement only by injunction. "In cases of this character," said the supreme court of Illinois in Cobb v. Illinois & St. L. R. & Coal Co. 68 Ill. 233, 235, "courts of equity have acted on broader principles [than in ordinary cases], and have adopted as a rule that an injunction will be granted to prevent a railway company from exceeding the powers granted in their charter.

The courts do not require, where the effort is manifested by a railway company to wrongfully appropriate private property, or force their structures to places not authorized, that there should be a want of a remedy at law." And in Lewis on Eminent Domain (§ 632), it is said, in substance, that the jurisdiction of equity in such cases may be placed upon the broad grounds that when the power of eminent domain has been delegated to public officers or others who are threatening to make an appropriation of private property to public uses in excess of the power granted, or without complying with the conditions on which the right to make the appropriation is given, equity will prevent the threatened wrong. "without regard to the question of irreparable damages or the existence of legal remedies which may afford a money compensation." The controlling inquiry therefore is whether the Metropolitan Company, which, it is not denied, has been in rightful possession, has appropriated or is about to appropriate any part of the leased premises to a corporate use which is not justified by the lease.

It is not to be doubted that, by consenting to the transfer of the leasehold to the railroad company, the appellant consented to any use of the property which was permitted to the original lessee; but it is not to be inferred that she thereby consented, as it is contended she did, to the particular use proposed, since there were various other railroad purposes which might have been in contemplation, and which in no sense would have been inconsistent with any condition or covenant of the lease. Of the elaborate and forceful argument made here on the part of the appellees the primary proposition is that "the railroad company, being the owner of the leasehold estate and of the buildings upon the premises in question, and in possession of the same, has the right to devote all or any portion of the premises to railroad purposes without resorting to proceedings under the eminent domain act to acquire the interest of the lessor." As corollary or subordinate propositions, it is asserted that the appellant has not been damaged by the changes made in the building; that the bill of complaint is a bill for specific performance, on which relief need not be granted as a matter of absolute right; that neither the railroad company nor its receiver has violated any covenant of the lease; and that the alterations made in the building and the proposed construction and use of railroad tracks do not constitute waste. In the first of these propositions is the explicit assertion, on which the entire argument mainly depends, that the railroad company owns the building erected upon the leased premises; and the same view finds expression in the opinion of the court below, where, after reference to some of the provisions in the lease, it is said, "In other words, the building now on the premises is subject to a lien for the rents to become due." While it is true that the intention to give the lessor a lien upon the building, as well as "upon all improvements and tenements, and the materials thereof which may be at any time put upon the said leased premises," and on "other property" of the tenant on the premises, is very explicitly declared, and it is also stipulated that at the end of the term the owner of the fee shall purchase the building or extend the term of the lease, it is clear upon the whole instrument that in no event was a removal from the premises of the building, which the lessee undertook to erect and keep in repair, contemplated. On no conceivable contingency can there arise under the contract a right on the part of the lessee to remove the building, even were it a physical possibility to do so. In contemplation of law, the building was intended to be, and accordingly in the process of construction it became, a part of the realty. "The well-settled rule is, that such erections as this become a part of the land, as each stone and brick are added to the structure." Kutter v. Smith, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 491, 17 L. ed. 880; Elves v. Mau, 8 East. 38; Tift v. Horton, 58 N. Y. 380, 13 Am. Rep. 537; Sanders v. Yonkers, 168 N. Y. 491; Ford v. Cobb, 20 N. Y. 844; Deane v. Hutchinson, 40 N. J. Eq. 83; Fortman v. Goepfer, 14 Ohio St. 558; Sword v. Low, 122 Ill. 487; Dooley v. Crist, 25 Ill. 553; Corrigan v. Chicago, 144 Ill. 587, 21 L. R. A. 212. See also Hawes v. Favor, 161 Ill. 440, cited by the appellees. In legal effect, the contract was that the lessee should erect upon the premises for the lessor a building, and maintain it in good repair to the end of the term of the lease, and that in consideration therefor (the rent, taxes, and other charges meanwhile having been discharged) the lessor should then pay to the lessee the specified percentage of the appraised cash value of the building, or, at her option, extend the term of the lease. Though in form the lessor is bound to purchase the building, the evident intention is simply that, in one or the other mode prescribed, compensation shall be made for the erection of the structure, and for keeping it in repair during the term of the lease. As a covenant running with the land, this may be a charge upon the entire property, but not upon the building alone. Against this construction of the lease, it is urged that the declaration of a lien on the building is made meaningless; but it is to be observed that, without a stipulation therefor, the landlord could have no lien on fixtures or other movable property of the tenant; and since it is not always easy to determine certainly what is or is not removable as a fixture, it was not necessarily ill advised or unnecessary to include the building in the stipulation for a lien.

The proposition being established that the title to the building, like that to the land, is in 39 L. R. A.

the appellant, it results that the rights of the parties in other respects must be determined on that basis; that is to say, by the same rules as if the building in its original form of construction, with its corner intact, had been upon the lot when the lease was executed. The contract required that the structure should cover the entire lot, and should cost not less than a stated sum, but it was always competent for the parties to waive any term of the agreement; and when, with the consent of the lessor, and by choice of the lessee, a building was constructed at a larger cost than was stipulated, and upon foundations which did not include a part of the lot next to the river, the rights and obligations of the parties became the same as if the actual construction and cost had been specifically required by the lease. And so if, by the original construction, the northeast corner had been of the shape caused by cutting away the stories above the first, that, being assented to, would have become the structure of the contract; and the question before us would have been, as suggested in the opinion below, whether, without the consent of the appellant, the railroad company, by virtue of its rights as assignee of the leasehold estate, could lay its girder and track and run its cars as it proposes to do. The repairs made on the building by the railroad company, after it took possession, were for the most part necessary, and therefore came within the covenant to repair; but if they had been entirely voluntary, and if other improvements were made, whereby the premises have an increased value, the building, nevertheless, remained the property of the appellant. The railroad company did not, by repairing or improving one part, acquire a right to destroy another part; and it is not material to the question of relief by injunction that the floor space of the part removed is small and insignificant in comparison with the space that remains. With all repairs and improvements, the building as it stood at the instant when the cutting away of the corner was commenced, belonged to the appellant. The title to the space taken and the reversionary right to the use of it were hers, and, as we conclude, it was not the privilege of the railroad company, without her consent, to remove any part of the structure in order to occupy the space with its tracks, the right to do so not having been acquired by condemnation.

The removal of the corner, for whatever purpose done, it seems clear, on the authorities cited, was an act of waste, which before its commission might have been enjoined. Brock v. Dole, 66 Wis. 142; Phelan v. Boylan, 25 Wis. 679; Hunt v. Browne, Sausse & S. 178; Davenport v. Magoon, 18 Or. 3, 57 Am. Rep. 1; Kidd v. Dennison, 6 Barb. 9; Agate v. Louvenbein, 57 N. Y. 604; Stetson v. Day, 51 Me. 434; Cannon v. Barry, 59 Miss. 289; 6 Wait, Act. & Def. 238, 239; 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 870. But whether, in any case where the question is solely one of waste already committed, and no appropriation of property to corporate use is intended, the court would interfere to compel reconstruction or a repair of the waste, is not the present question. If it were, possibly it would be proper to give weight to such equitable considerations as that the appellant's security is not to be impaired, and to other like suggestions which have been urged; but when, as here, waste has been committed by removing a substantial part of the building which was intended to be a permanent structure, for the purpose of making way perpetually or indefinitely for the track of a railroad, the work of removal is not to be considered by itself, but as a step in the execution of a scheme to take property for a corporate use without making compensation, which as already stated, the court will enjoin, though the right invaded be a purely legal or technical one. Only in that way can the policy of the enactments against the taking of private property for corporate uses without compensation be fully vindicated; and without an order for the restoration of the building to its original form, or, in default thereof, a forfeiture of the lease, the relief would not be adequate or complete.

It is of course, true, as said below, that the leasehold estate is in the entire lot, and that the tenant has possession of all the space above it, as well what is not actually filled by the building as what is; but, whatever might be the thought of the case if the space in question had been open at the start, the tenant, it is clear, had no right to take down the upper stories of the building in order to create the unfilled space; and therefore, as we conceive, it is not true, as was further stated, that while the term of the lease continues, nothing is invaded but the interest of the tenant. There has been already a destruction of property which constitutes a taking in violation of the law of eminent domain as distinctly as would the digging out and removal of earth from the corner of the lot; and, besides, the reversionary interest has been directly affected, and will be further affected if the proposed location of the girder and track of the railroad be not forbidden. The demand of the appellant for present relief against the wrong done and intended is not met by the suggestion that, "if the leasehold estate should be extinguished, of course the railroad company would be a trespasser, if it did not remove its girder." The railroad company might abandon possession, leaving to the landlord the expense both of removing the girder and of reconstructing the torn-down corner, with recourse for the outlay upon no responsible party; but more likely, the trespasser would surrender possession, if at all, only at the end of a litigation, to the expenses and contingencies of which the appellant or her successor in interest ought not, by judicial sanction, to be subjected. The proposed occupation of the premises is shown to be necessary in order to overcome engineering difficulties which otherwise are practically insuperable, but, if it were only a matter of convenience, it would be equally evident that the occupation is intended to be, and will be, perpetual, as, doubtless, the public interest will require that it shall be. If, as was stated at the hearing, the charter of the present railroad company is limited to fifty years, that signifies only that from time to time, when necessary, new companies will be organized, to which, in succession, the road and its equipment will be transferred. As against the lessor such an occupation of her property is wrongful from the beginning. The possessory right is in the lessee, and for that reason, it may be, the railroad company, until the lease shall have ended by lapse of time or by forfeiture, cannot be dealt with as a trespasser; but, that being so, it is the more important that the remedy here invoked should not be denied. If the lease were for a short term, one year or ten, instead of ninety years, it would be evident that the railroad company has exceeded its privileges as tenant, and has invaded, appropriated, and injured present property rights of the landlord and reversionary interests, which, without consent or proceedings to condemn, it had no right to take or injure. The bill, it is plain, is not one for specific performance merely. It is not a valid objection to our conclusion that it may be difficult, or even impossible by any certain rule, to estimate the compensation which, in a proceeding to condemn, should be awarded the appellant.

The decree below is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings. In order to obviate destruction or serious injury to property, the court may grant reasonable time for proceedings to condemn.

Y. 316, dictum; Crowell v. Kirk, 14 N. C. (3 Dev. L.) 355; Gibson v. Gibson, 9 Yerg. 329.

Attesting witnesses to a will have always been permitted to express their opinions as to the sanity of the testator on the ground that the law has made it their duty to inspect the testator's capacity, and presumes they did observe and judge of it. Appleby v. Brock, 76 Mo. 314.

The witnesses to a will are not called upon to attest the fact of signing alone, but to determine both the capacity of the testator and as to whether he is sane or insane at the time of its execution. Heyward v. Hazard, 1 Bay. 335.

And they are competent to testify as to the state of the testator's mind, and may, in addition to the facts stated, give their opinions as to their competency. Pidcock v. Potter, 68 Pa. 343, 8 Am. Rep. 181.

No one should subscribe his name as a witness to a will until he is clearly satisfied that the testator is possessed of a sound and disposing mind and memory, and that in executing it he acts understandingly and with full knowledge of its contents. Scribner v. Crane, 2 Paige, 147.

And their opinions as to the capacity of a testator are admitted because they are supposed from their experience and study to have peculiar knowledge upon the subject of inquiry which jurors generally have not, and are thus supposed to be more capable of drawing conclusions from the facts, and of passing opinions thereon, than the jurors are presumed to be. Re McCarthy, 55 Hun, 7.

And the attesting witnesses to a will may express an opinion as to the capacity of the testator the same as an expert may, without being confined to narratives of facts and conduct as other witnesses are. Martin v. Perkins, 56 Miss. 204.

And they may testify as to sanity without being called upon as experts. Parsons v. Parsons, 66 Iowa, 754.

An exception exists to the New York rule that a nonexpert witness can only characterize as rational or irrational the acts and declarations to which he testifies, and cannot express an opinion on the general question whether the mind of a testator was sound or unsound in case of an attesting witness to a will. Clapp v. Fullerton, 34 N. Y. 190, 90 Am. Dec. 681.

So, the general rule is that the subscribing witnesses to a will may give their opinions as to the testamentary capacity of a testator without giving the facts upon which they are founded. Titlow v. Titlow, 54 Pa. 216, 93 Am. Dec. 691; Logan v. McGinnis, 12 Pa. 27; Potts v. House, 6 Ga. 324, 50 Am. Dec. 329; Robinson v. Adams, 62 Me. 369, 16 Am. Rep. 473; Williams v. Lee, 47 Md. 321; Crowell v. Kirk, 14 N. C. (3 Dev. L.) 355; Van Huss v. Rainbolt, 2 Coldw. 139; First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 12 W. N. C. 150.

And without assigning cause or reason. Gibson v. Gibson, 9 Yerg. 329; Puryear v. Reese, 6 Coldw.

And without stating the grounds upon which they are formed. Lodge v. Lodge, 2 Houst. (Del.) 419.

The rule that the opinions of nonexpert witnesses in a will contest must be based on facts to be entitled to weight does not apply to the subscribing witnesses to the will who are regarded in law as placed around the testator to ascertain and judge as to his capacity. Young v. Barner, 27 Gratt. 96.

The condition of a testator's mind as evidenced by his actions, conduct, and conversations at the time of making his will is a part of the res gestæ of the transaction, and witnesses to the will are competent to speak thereof and give opinions in relation thereto without any knowledge other than that derived from his conduct on such occasions. Re Coleman, 111 N. Y. 220.

And a request to an attesting witness to give his opinion as to the testator's capacity to make a disposition of his property by will is not subject to the objection that he has not seen the testator sufficiently to be able to judge. Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 233.

The subscribing witnesses to a will may be examined by either party, however, as to what transpired at the time he witnessed the instrument. Robinson v. Adams, 62 Me. 369, 16 Am. Rep. 473.

And they need not be examined by the proponent in a will contest as to the sanity of the testator upon their first examination. The party contesting may cross-examine them as to that point, and need not wait until he puts in his side of the case and then recall them. Puryear v. Reese, 6 Coldw. 21.

The condition of mind of the testator at the time of the execution of his will is a part of the res gestæ in a will contest, and it is competent to ask a subscribing witness upon cross-examination what the condition of the mind of the testator was as to soundness or unsoundness when he signed it. Egbert v. Egbert, 78 Pa. 323.

And permitting the contestants of a will to cross-examine the subscribing witnesses on the question of the soundness or unsoundness of mind of the testator before they have opened their case is not a departure from the rule of evidence that a defendant who has not opened his case will not be allowed to introduce it to the jury by cross-examining the witness for the adverse party. Egbert v. Egbert, 78 Pa. 323.

And a subscribing witness to a will, who testified in chief as to its execution and the testator's sanity at the time, and the facts connected with its preparation and interviews with the testator concerning it, may be examined anew on rebuttal without restriction upon the points in controversy. Nash v. Hunt, 116 Mass. 237.

It has been held, however, that the evidence of a subscribing witness to a will as to the insanity of the testator is not admissible in a proceeding to contest the will. Kenworthy v. Williams, 5 Ind. 373.

And that a subscribing witness to a will cannot give her opinion that the testator was insane at the time the will was made, where she testifies to no facts indicating insanity. Dickinson v. Dickinson, 61 Pa. 401.

And the rule has been laid down that the opinions of witnesses to a will as to the testamentary capacity or incapacity of the testator are competent, when the facts and circumstances on which such opinions are founded are disclosed. Abraham v. Wilkins, 17 Ark. 292; Walker v. Walker, 14 Ga. 215; Cilley v. Cilley, 34 Me. 162.

And refusal to permit a witness to a will, who issues for trial in the superior court as to whether or not testator was of sound and disposing mind and memory, and whether or not the bill was procured through undue influence.

Counsel for the administrators offered a paper purporting to be the will in evidence which was objected to because it was not proved by the subscribing witnesses. Counsel had testified as to what occurred when he witnessed it, and that the conversations and acts of the testator detailed by him impressed him at the time as perfectly rational, to answer a question whether there was anything in his manner or appearance different from what he had seen for the year past, is not erroneous within the rule that a subscribing witness can give his opinion generally as to the soundness of mind of a testator where the objection was general; if the party asking the question desired the benefit of the exceptional rule applicable to such witness the form of the question should have distinctly indicated it. Petrie v. Petrie, 2 Silv. Sup. Ct. 438.

So, a nonexpert witness who is the subscribing witness to a deed offered to prove the mental capacity of a grantor has been held to be within the same principle which allows a subscribing witness to a will to give his opinion of the sanity of the testator. Brand v. Brand, 39 How. Pr. 133; Dewitt v. Barley, 9 N. Y. 371.

But, upon the other hand, the rule has been adopted that deeds are good without subscribing witnesses, and the rule allowing subscribing witnesses to wills to testify as to their opinions of the testator's capacity to make a will does not apply to the subscribing witnesses to a deed who must testify to facts only on the question of the sanity or capacity of the grantor. Dean v. Fuller, 40 Pa. 474.

The opinions of the subscribing witnesses to a deed or other contract, however, are competent in all cases where the object is to prove capacity or incapacity to make a contract when the facts or circumstances are disclosed on which the opinion is founded. Kelly v. McGuire, 15 Ark. 555.

A subscribing witness to a codicil is not a competent witness on the question of the sanity of the testator at the time of making it, where he was a legatee under the original will. Gass v. Gass, 3 Humph. 278.

And it is not competent to ask a subscribing witness to a will whether he would have attested it had he known of the dispositions contained in it as tending to establish fraud or imbecility. Spence v. Spence, 4 Watts, 165.

And that the testator had a dislike for one of the subscribing witnesses to his will is not admissible as tending to show fraud or imbecility. Spence v. Spence, 4 Watts, 165.

As to the effect of subscribing a will on the privilege of the subscribing witness, see note "Non-expert opinions as to sanity or insanity," to Ryder v. State (Ga.) 88 L. R. A. 721.

II. Necessity of giving.

Witnesses to a will are placed around a testator to ascertain and judge of his capacity, and the heir has a right to insist that the testimony of all such witnesses be given to the jury, and they must all be produced if living and under the power of the court. Chase v. Lincoln, 3 Mass. 236; Field's Appeal, 36 Conn. 277; Jauncey v. Thorne, 2 Barb. Ch. 40, 45 Am. Dec. 424; Bootle v. Blundell, 19 Ves. Jr. 494.

The heir in a will contest has the right to insist that the triers shall have the benefit of the observation and opinions of all the witnesses to the will if practicable, and that the parties seeking to establish the will shall put them upon the stand; but this right may be waived, and is waived unless insisted upon at the time. Field's Appeal, 36 Conn. 277.

And the rule of the English court of chancery is that upon a bill filed to establish a will all the subscribing witnesses, if living and competent to testify, must be called by the party seeking to establish it, and must be examined by him so as to give the adverse party an opportunity to cross-examine them as to the sanity of the testator and the circumstances attending the execution of the will; and the rule is the same upon the trial of an issue devisavit vel non awarded by the court of chancery. Jauncey v. Thorne, 2 Barb. Ch. 40, 45 Am. Dec. 424, dictum.

So, a subscribing witness to a deed must be called in an action thereon where non est factum is pleaded, though he has become blind, and it is not enough to prove his handwriting. Crank v. Frith, 2 Moody & R. 262, 9 Car. & P. 197.

It is not necessary to the establishment of a will, however, that the subscribing witnesses should have stated their opinions as to his mental capacity, as such opinions are necessarily mere inferences drawn by them from facts observed. Cilley v. Cilley, 34 Me. 182; Mayo v. Mayo, 114 Mo. 536.

And the inability of a subscribing witness to a will, who had been introduced to the testator for that purpose, to testify to his capacity, does not invalidate the will, but goes only to the credibility of such witness in case he is called upon to testify as to sanity or mental capacity. Huff v. Huff, 41 Ga. 604.

While a will is required to be attested by two witnesses, it may be proved by one of them who testifies to the attestation by the other and to the competency of the testator, though the other does not testify. Cheatham v. Hatcher, 80 Gratt. 56, 32 Am. Rep. 650.

And where any of the witnesses of a will are dead or in such a situation that their testimony cannot be obtained, proof of their signatures is received as secondary evidence of the facts to which they have attested by subscribing the will as witnesses thereto. Jauncey v. Thorne, 2 Barb. Ch. 40, 45 Am. Dec. 424.

And where there is a failure to prove testamentary capacity of a testator by the subscribing witnesses to the will, the executor or proponent is not precluded from establishing his insanity by other testimony. Frear v. Williams, 7 Baxt. 550.

So, in Butler v. Benson, 1 Barb. 528, it was held generally that if the subscribing witnesses to a will fail to prove it, other witnesses may be called, but the proof in such case must be very clear.

The fact that a party attested the execution of a will affords prima facie evidence that he considered the testator sane. Williams v. Lee, 47 Md. 321.

And proof of the signature of a deceased subscribing witness to a will establishes prima facie the competency of the testator to make it. Harden v. Hays, 9 Pa. 151.

Subscribing as a witness to a will is an assertion by the subscriber that the testator was of sound mind when he executed it. Egbert v. Egbert, 78 Pa. 326.

And a will is established where the attesting witnesses, who must necessarily be called to prove its execution if living and within the reach of process, do not impeach the testator's sanity, or if, being absent or dead, their handwriting is proved, unless proof of insanity is offered by the contestants, the sanity of the testator being sustained by the presumption that every one is sane. Perkins v. Perkins, 39 N. H. 163.

So, where the attesting witnesses to a deed are dead, it will be taken in an action involving its va-for the administrators insisted that the will was admissible under the issues to be tried without being duly proved, and the court sustained the contention.

lidity that they would have sworn to the sanity of the grantor. Towart v. Sellars, 5 Dow, P. C. 231.

And a deed attested by a witness who afterwards became blind may be read in evidence on proof of the witness's handwriting without calling him. Pedler v. Paige, 1 Moody & R. 258.

So, where attesting witnesses to a will speak as to the execution thereof only, documents in the testator's handwriting, showing both capacity and knowledge of contents, though not mentioning the residue, supply proof of capacity, and will warrant its admission to probate, where she managed her own property, received her dividends, and did various acts of business, corresponded rationally with her friends, and was not shown to be under any delusion, though she drank excessively and was guilty of great extravagances, and the will totally excluded her next of kin with whom she had quarreled, and was in the handwriting and executed in the office of her attorney, who was one of the executors and a residuary legatee to a large amount, he and his family both having large legacies. Wheeler v. Alderson, 3 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 574.

A will will not be admitted to probate, however, where the attesting witnesses testified merely that the signature is that of the testator, and he is proved to have been a person of imbecile mind not capable of understanding anything. Starnes v. Marten, 1 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 294.

And an instruction in a will contest that the law presumes from the certificate of the subscribing witnesses that at the time of the execution of the will the testator was of sound and disposing mind and memory is erroneous as likely to mislead the jury into a belief that the presumption was conclusive. Keithley v. Stafford, 126 Ill. 507.

And the failure to examine the scrivener who wrote the will, and the subscribing witnesses thereto, to uphold it, in a will contest in a doubtful case, is a material and damaging circumstance against the proponents having much adverse force. Ulmer's Appeal (Pa.) 11 Cent. Rep. 403.

And the contrary rule has been held that the fact that a person attested a will does not furnish evidence of any opinion on his part as to the sanity of the testator. Baxter v. Abbott, 7 Gray, 71.

And that when the attesting witnesses to a will are dead there is no presumption that if living they would testify that the testator was of sound mind at the time of making his will. Boardman v. Woodman, 47 N. H. 120.

And the same rule has been applied to deeds, Flanders v. Davis, 19 N. H. 139.

So, proof of a will by one of the subscribing witnesses only is insufficient to establish it under the Missouri statute of wills requiring the subscribing witnesses to a will to attest, not only the corporal act of signing, but also the sanity of the testator. Withinton v. Withinton, 7 Mo. 589.

And to entitle a will devising real estate to probate in New York, in addition to the formal proof of due execution, it must also appear that the testator at the time of executing it was in all respects competent to dispose of his estate, and not under any restraint, by the testimony of at least two subscribing witnesses to the will who should have had at least some acquaintance with him. Swenarton v. Hancock, 9 Abb. N. C. 326.

And testimony of a single subscribing witness in a will contest, who was a stranger to the testator, the other subscribing witnesses being dead, as to the formalities of execution and that the testatrix understood the provisions of the instrument, stating that she was of sound mind at the time, is not 89 L. R. A.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

sufficient proof of mental competency under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2623, providing for the admission of a will to probate where it appears to the surrogate that the testator was competent to make a will, and the proceedings thereon will be dismissed on motion. Ramaddell v. Viele, 6 Dem. 244.

All that the New York statute requires in such cases, however, is that it shall appear from the proof taken before the surrogate that the will was duly executed by a testator who was competent to make a will and free from restraint, and it is not necessary that each witness thereto should be able to swear that all the requisites of the statute had been complied with. Jauncey v. Thorne, 2 Barb. Ch. 40.

So, the testimony of the subscribing witnesses only to a will is admissible on the question of the testator's sanity under the Illinois statute, on appeal taken on an order of the county court allowing probate thereof. Bice v. Hall, 120 Ill. 597; Andrews v. Black, 43 Ill. 258; Walker v. Walker, 3 Ill. 291.

But other evidence than that of the subscribing witnesses may be heard where the probate of the will has been refused. Andrews v. Black, 43 Ill. 258.

And it is not necessary that the subscribing witnesses should be called in an issue out of chancery in a will contest on the ground of testamentary incapacity, or that when called they should concur in their testimony; other witnesses may be examined even to contradict them. Rigg v. Wilton, 13 Ill. 15, 54 Am. Dec. 419.

But where, upon the probate of a will, one subscribing witness testifies that the testator was sane at the time of the making of the will, and the other testifies that he was insane, the evidence of other witnesses is not admissible to establish the will. Weld v. Sweeney, 85 Ill. 50.

Though a witness to a will need not swear positively, as a matter of fact, that the testator was sane on an application to probate, in order to procure its admission under the Illinois statute, requiring the subscribing witnesses to swear they believe the testator to have been of sound mind; their opinion or belief is all that is required. Allison v. Allison, 46 Ill. 61, 92 Am. Dec. 237.

But testimony of a witness on an application for probate, that he did not know whether the testator was of sound mind or not, that he might have been or might not, is not sufficient to procure its admission to probate. Allison v. Allison, 46 Ill. 61, 92 Am. Dec. 237.

III. Scope.

The opinion of a witness in regard to the sanity of a testator is not rendered competent by the fact that the witness was a subscribing witness, where the question was not limited to an inquiry as to the opinion of the witness in regard to the sanity of the testator at the time of the will. Re McCarthy, 55 Hun. 7.

And the opinion of an attesting witness to a will, formed at another time before or after the execution of the will, in respect to the testator's mental capacity, stands like that of any other witness, and is not admissible in a state where opinions of ordinary witnesses are inadmissible. Williams v. Spencer, 150 Mass. 346, 5 L. R. A. 790.

And the subsequently formed opinion of a subscribing witness as to the soundness or unsoundness of mind of a testator, based on what he had heard subsequent to the execution of the will, is not admissible in evidence in a proceeding to contest it. Gwin v. Gwin (Idaho) 48 Pac. 295.

So, an opinion by a subscribing witness to a will

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It was conceded at the argument that when the issues were framed no question was raised concerning the execution of the alleged will. At the trial in the superior court it was admitted by the appellants that the paper which was offered and read against their objection as to whether the testator had mind sufficient at the time he is alleged to have executed it to give specific directions with reference to the disposition of his property to his attorney is incompetent, as the inquiry embraced in the question covers the whole issue as to testamentary capacity, the opinion covering the only question in dispute. Re McCarthy, 55 Hun, 7.

And the opinion of an attesting witness to a will, not an expert, as to the strength of mind required to comprehend a clause creating charitable trusts in a will, and as to whether the testator had sufficient strength of mind to comprehend it, is not admissible in a will contest. Melaney v. Morrison, 152 Mass. 473.

And an inquiry of an attesting witness upon cross-examination in a will contest as to whether he thought the testator had mind sufficient at the time he is alleged to have executed his last will to give specific directions with reference to the disposition of his property to his attorney is not competent for the purpose of ascertaining the degree of intelligence possessed by the witness for the purpose of enabling the court to determine the reliance which should be placed upon his evidence given on direct examination, where he had only stated facts which had come within his observation, and expressed no opinion as to the soundness of mind and memory of the testator. Re McCarthy, 55 Hun, 7.

A witness in a will need not use the statutory formula "sound mind and memory," however, in stating his belief as to the testamentary capacity of the testator, in a proceeding to probate his will; it is sufficient if he states his belief in equivalent words. Bice v. Hall, 120 Ill. 597.

And the answer of a subscribing witness to a will as to his belief of the testator's mental capacity will not be suppressed when his disposition shows that he used the word "belief" as synonymous with opinion. Hughes v. Hughes, 31 Ala. 519.

So, the subscribing witnesses to a will are not debarred by any rule of law from giving evidence of a testator's insanity, however improper it may be to witness a will believing the testator to be incapable of making it. Garrison v. Blanton, 48 Tex. 299.

The fact that a party has testified to the execution of a will, while it affords prima facie evidence that he considered the testator insane, does not prevent him from testifying as to her mental condition, and whether in point of fact he considered her to be sane or insane. Williams v. Lee, 47 Md. 321; Howard v. Braithwaite, 1 Ves. & B. 202.

But see Dickinson v. Dickinson, 61 Pa. 401, supra, I.

IV. Contradiction.

The opinions of subscribing witnesses to a will as to the sanity or insanity of the testator are not conclusive. Howard's Will, 5 T. B. Mon. 199, 17 Am. Dec. 60.

Wills may be established against the testimony of subscribing witnesses who depose against the testator's capacity. Howard's Will, 5 T. B. Mon. 199, 17 Am. Dec. 60; Cheatham v. Hatcher, 30 Gratt. 56, 82 Am. Rep. 350; Rigg v. Wilton, 13 Ill. 15, 54 Am. Dec. 419.

The capacity of a testator to make a valid will may be established by other evidence, though the subscribing witnesses thereto testify that the testator was not of sound mind at the time it was made. Sechrest v. Edwards, 4 Met. (Ky.) 163; Jenkins' Will, 43 Wis. 610; Higgins v. Carlton, 28 Md. 115, 92 Am. Dec. 666; LeBreton v. Fletcher, 2 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 558; Boote v. Blundell, 19 Ves. Jr. 494; Abbot v. 89 L. R. A.

Plumbe, 1 Dougl. 216; Lowe v. Joliffe, 1 W. Bl. 365, citing Pike v. Bradmering, and Austin v. Willes, Bull. N. P. 264; Hudson's Case, Skinner, 79.

Other witnesses in a will contest than the subscribing witnesses are competent to testify as to the mental condition of the testator, the only difference being that the subscribing witnesses may give their opinions as to his mental condition, while the other witnesses are confined to a narration of facts, and where such testimony is satisfactory the will should be probated though the subscribing witnesses may testify against the testator's capacity. Martin v. Perkins, 56 Miss. 204.

The attesting witnesses to a will being produced and examined, it is not essential that they should sustain the legal presumption of sanity, and they may all deny the sanity of the testator; and yet if a sane condition of mind is shown by the whole evidence the will must be established. Perkins v. Perkins, 39 N. H. 163, citing Le Breton v. Fletcher, 2 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 558; Lowe v. Joliffe, 1 W. Bl. 365; Austin v. Willes, Bull. N. P. 264; Pike v. Bradmering, cited in 2 Strange, 1096; 1 Wms. Exrs. 290, note; Phillips' Ev. Cowen & Hill's notes, 392.

Thus, the party calling a subscribing witness to a will, who declares his belief that the testator was incompetent at the time he made his will, may contradict him by reading his evidence taken on a former trial, and by proof or declarations previously made. Harden v. Hays, 9 Pa. 151.

And evidence of previous inconsistent declarations on the part of an attesting witness is admissible on behalf of the proponent in a will contest, where the attesting witness had testified that the testator did not have testamentary capacity, and the proponent had examined him only so far as the law made it his imperative duty. Thornton v. Thornton, 39 Vt. 122.

So, evidence as to mental capacity, contradicting that of an attesting witness to a will, may be received to invalidate the will. Spencer v. Moore, 4 Cal. (Va.) 423.

And declarations of a deceased subscribing witness that the testator was incompetent at the time of the execution of his will, are admissible in evidence where the will is proved by evidence of his signature. Harden v. Hays, 9 Pa. 151.

And declarations of an attesting witness in a will, who has since died, made on the same day that the will was executed, that he did not believe that the testator was sane at the time he executed it, and that he signed as witness merely to gratify him, are properly admissible in evidence in a proceeding to contest the will. Townshend v. Townshend, 9 Gill, 506.

And an admission made by an attesting witness to a will that the testator was not competent at the time the will was executed, and that he signed as an attesting witness only to attest her signature, is admissible in evidence in an action involving the validity of a will for the purpose of rebutting the prima facie effect of his attestation. Colvin v. Warford, 20 Md. 357.

Evidence by a subscribing witness to a will that the testator was non compos at the time it was made, and contradictory statements made on a previous trial, and declarations as to capacity previously made, introduced to contradict him, should be left with the jury on the question of the capacity of the testator. Harden v. Hays, 9 Pa. 151.

And where subscribing witnesses do not agree in opinion as to the capacity of the testator, or as to facts upon which they found their opinions, either side may show, either by collateral circumstances and exception was the identical paper which was signed by the testator, and attested by the three subscribing witnesses, who subsequently were called and testified, and was the same paper offered in the probate court, and on which the appeal was taken to the supreme judicial court. The appellants contended, however, that the paper was not admissible in or by direct proof, that one of them is more credible than the other, or that one of them is mistaken in his facts. Bell v. Clark, 31 N. C. (9 Ired. L.) 230.

So, a deed may be upheld where the subscribing witnesses detailed facts and circumstances evidencing a competent mental capacity, and a preponderance of disinterested evidence sustains the grantor's capacity, though one of the subscribing witnesses expresses it as his opinion that he was not of sufficient capacity to make a contract. Jones v. Evans, 7 Dana, 96.

The declarations of one of three subscribing witnesses to a will that the testator was insane when it was executed are not admissible, however, to defeat the will, where he was absent from the state, and no proof as to his handwriting had been given, and the will had been proved by the other two witnesses. Fox v. Evans, 3 Yeates, 506.

And evidence in a will contest that one of the attesting witnesses, who had testified in probate court to the testator's sanity, and who had since died, declared after the probate that he wished to live to unsay what he had said, and that the testator was insane, is not admissible, as his attestation furnishes no evidence that he believed the testator to be sane. Baxter v. Abbott, 7 Gray, 71.

And where a subscribing witness to a will swears at the trial of a contest thereof that in his opinion the testatrix was of sound and disposing mind at the time of the execution of the will, and denies that he ever made any inconsistent declarations, evidence of another witness that he heard the subscribing witness make such inconsistent statements, though admissible as discrediting the subscribing witness, is not admissible as primary evidence, as it would be mere hearsay. Stirling v. Stirling, 64 Md. 138.

And the rule has been adopted by some of the cases that the declarations of a deceased subscribing witness to a will, tending to show that he thought the testator to be insane, are not admissible in evidence in a proceeding to contest the will. Boardman v. Woodman, 47 N. H. 120; Sellars v. Sellars, 2 Heisk. 430.

As by attesting he asserted in legal effect the mental capacity of the testator. Sellars v. Sellars, 2 Heisk. 430.

And that declarations of an attesting witness to a will respecting the capacity of the testator at the time he made it cannot be given in evidence after his death to impeach the evidence given by him in probate court which is read in evidence in the court above, where he has not been interrogated as to such admissions; and the fact that opportunity for such interrogation was cut off by his death does not affect the rule. Kunyan v. Price, 15 Ohio St. 1, 86 Am. Dec. 459.

So, evidence in an action involving the validity of a will of conversations between the attesting witnesses with reference to the competency of the testator is not admissible as tending to rebut the effect of their attestation. Colvin v. Warford, 20 Md. 357.

And evidence of statements made by an attesting witness to a will who has since died, in derogation of the testator's capacity to make a will, is inadmissible. Sewall v. Robbins, 139 Mass. 164.

And a subscribing witness to a will is not competent to testify in a contest upon the ground of undue influence and mental incapacity of the testator, that the object of making the will was to quiet the testator. Stephenson v. Stephenson, 62 Iowa, 163.

So, in Goodtitle, Alexander, v. Clayton, 4 Burr. 2225, in which witnesses who attested a will were called to give evidence against their own attestation, and 39 L. R. A.

other witnesses were called to support the will, the whole court expressed its disapprobation of permitting witnesses to give evidence against a will to which they acknowledged they had attested as subscribing witnesses.

For special statutory rules as to the admissibility of the testimony of the subscribing witnesses on the question of mental capacity, see Illinois cases, supra, II.

V. Weight.

Opinions of attesting witnesses to a will, and facts stated by them as occurring at the time of its execution, are entitled to great weight on the question of testamentary capacity in a will contest. Whitenack v. Stryker, 2 N. J. Eq. 8; Turner v. Chessman, 15 N. J. Eq. 248; Jamison v. Jamison, 3 Houst. (Del.) 108; Kelly v. Perrault (Idaho) 48 Pac. 45; Cornelius v. Cornelius, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 593; Martin v. Thayer, 37 W. Va. 38; Nicholas v. Kershner, 20 W. Va. 251; Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 680, 2 L. R. A. 668; Harrison v. Rowan, 3 Wash. C. C. 580; Field's Appeal, 36 Conn. 277.

If they were persons of intelligence and veracity. Jamison v. Jamison, 3 Houst. (Del.) 108.

The attesting witnesses to a will are called upon by duty to examine into and satisfy themselves as to the capacity of the testator, and their evidence is most to be relied upon, and next after them those who were present at the execution, their opportunities being equal. Stevens v. Vancleve, 4 Wash. C. C. 262.

The opinion of an expert is entitled to little weight as against the evidence of the attesting witnesses. Kelly v. Perrault (Idaho) 48 Pac. 45.

And the incapacity of a testator should be sustained by strong testimony as to facts showing a defect of mind existing in a form that the subscribing witness may not have detected, to invalidate the will where its execution was marked by circumstances of fair dealing, and the subscribing witnesses were above suspicion and fully aware of their duty and competent to perform. Means v. Means, 5 Strobb. L. 167.

And where the attesting witnesses to a will are disinterested medical men who speak strongly to sanity, the court will not set aside a will on proof by interrogatories but without plea that the testator many years before had been under an insane delusion. Kemble v. Church, 3 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 273.

So, positive opinions upon the part of an attesting witness to a will that the testator's mind was sound are sufficient to overcome testimony to the effect that the testator had not disposed of all of his real estate by his will, and the opinions of two or three witnesses that he was much broken and very forgetful, testifying particularly to several slight instances of want of recollection. Buckminster v. Perry, 4 Mass. 568.

And the evidence of three out of four disinterested subscribing witnesses to a will as to the testamentary capacity of a testator ninety-three years of age outweighs that of ten other witnesses, all of whom were related to the testator either by blood or affinity, where the other subscribing witness was dead, and the testator's attending physician, although subpoenaed and present at the trial, was not examined. Sutton v. Morgan, 30 N. J. Eq. 629.

So, testimony of a priest, who drew a will for a person afflicted with epileptic fits, and who had no interest thereunder, that the testator fully comprehended the will, showing all the circumstances under which it was executed, is sufficient to sustain it, though he had an epileptic fit about five minutes after signing it, after which he sank rapidly evidence except upon proof of the signature of the testator, by the subscribing witnesses, as in the case of other instruments when the signature is attested by subscribing witnesses.

and died the next morning; and the testimony of one of the subscribing witnesses that the testator did not know what was going on will not affect its validity in view of the impropriety of attesting a will when the testator was known to be in such a condition, and of the fact that such witness propounded the will for probate and stated in his sworn petition that he believed the instrument propounded to be the testator's last will and testament. Re Lewis, 51 Wis. 101.

And a finding by a judge of probate that a testator was of sound and disposing mind will not be disturbed on appeal where five witnesses and the draftsmen of the will and the subscribing witnesses gave their opinions that he was of sound and disposing mind, founding them upon facts and rational reasons to which they testify, though twelve witnesses testify to his insanity, giving facts and reasons tending to show insanity upon which they base their conclusions, four of whom were physicians and three of whom had attended the testator from time to time and expressed the opinion that he could not have had a lucid interval. Brock v. Luckett, 4 How. (Miss.) 459.

Where the subscribing witnesses to a will state their opinion as to the condition of the testator's mind, giving the facts upon which the opinions are founded, however, reliance should be placed on the facts proved rather than on the opinions expressed by the witnesses. Cilley v. Cilley, 34 Me. 162.

And the mere opinion of a subscribing witness to a will, unsupported by the facts upon which it is based, is entitled to no more weight in a will contest than that of other witnesses. Garrison v. Garrison, 15 N. J. Eq. 236.

And the opinion of a witness in a will contest, who is a stranger to the testator, and who sees or hears nothing except what is necessary to enable him to attest the instrument, should be given less weight than that of a neighbor, and familiar acquaintance of the testator, and neither is of any weight except as proved to be correct from facts which justify and warrant it. Garrison v. Garrison, 15 N. J. Eq. 236.

So, the testimony of the subscribing witnesses is not the only evidence as to testamentary capacity that can be given. Field's Appeal, 38 Conn. 277; Martin v. Perkins, 56 Miss. 204; Morton v. Heidorn, 125 Mo. 606.

And the inability of an attesting witness to a will to testify to the mental capacity of a testator does not render the will invalid, but goes only to the credibility of the witness in case he is called upon to testify as to sanity or mental capacity. Huff v. Huff, 41 Ga. 696.

And probate of a will will be granted where there is nothing in the evidence to negative testamentary capacity except while the testatrix was actually under the influence of an epileptic fit to which she was subject, though there was an entire absence of proof of instructions or knowledge of contents, and the attesting witnesses could not recollect any of the circumstances attending its execution, where they recognized their signatures and thereupon had no doubt of the truth of their attestation. Foot v. Stanton, 1 Deane & S. 19.

So, the subscribing witnesses to a will are not necessarily the best to prove the sanity of the testator. McTaggart v. Thompson, 14 Pa. 149.

The testimony of a subscribing witness to a will as to the sanity of a testator is not invested by law with any fictitious value beyond what it is worth under the usual considerations governing the value of testimony, but is to be weighed with reference to his special opportunity and occasion to observe at the precise moment in question, as well as with reference to his care, skill, judgment, memory, and veracity. Thornton v. Thornton, 39 Vt. 122.

And a will may be set aside on the ground of the insanity of a testator against the testimony of the subscribing witnesses to sanity, where there was proof of previous insanity and the dispositions made were not rational or natural, and circumstances of mystery and suspicion attended the subscription of the will. Griffin v. Griffin, R. M. Charit. (Ga.) 217.

So, the opinions of the subscribing witnesses to a will, given twenty years after their attestation, that the testator was incompetent, should be received with great jealousy. Howard's Will, 5 T. B. Mon. 199, 17 Am. Dec. 60.

And an instruction in a will contest that ordinarily those witnesses whose testimony comes nearest to the very time of making the will would be the most valuable if they seem worthy of credit, and that therefore the testimony of the subscribing witnesses to the will is to be carefully considered and scrutinized, is not objectionable as telling the jury that the testimony of an attesting witness was entitled to greater weight than that of other witnesses having the same means of knowledge. Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 238.

So, where subscribing witnesses to a will concur in the facts which go to make up the execution, but differ as to the degree of intoxication of the testator and its effect on his mind and memory, the weight due to their respective opinions may depend upon their intelligence and the opportunity they had of knowing how far the party's faculties were ordinarily overcome by intoxication and the actual effects at the time of the execution of the instrument. Bell v. Clark, 81 N. C. (9 Ired. L.) 239.

A witness to a will by his act of attestation solemnly testifies to the sanity of the testator, however, and if he afterwards attempts to impeach the validity of the will his evidence, though not to be positively rejected, is to be received with the most scrupulous jealousy. Young v. Barner, 27 Gratt. 96; Lamberts v. Cooper, 29 Gratt. 61; Cheatnam v. Hatcher, 30 Gratt. 56, 32 Am. Rep. 650; Gwin v. Gwin (Idaho) 48 Pac. 296; Hoerth v. Zable, 92 Ky. 202; Harrison v. Rowan, 3 Wash. C. C. 580; Den, Stevens, v. Vancleve, 4 Wash. C. C. 262; Bootle v. Blundell, 19 Ves. Jr. 494; Howard v. Braithwaite, 1 Ves. & B. 202.

As it is an impeachment of his own act. Bootle v. Blundell, 19 Ves. Jr. 494.

And as he is guilty of great misbehavior in attesting when his opinion is against sanity. Harrison v. Rowan, 3 Wash. C. C. 580.

And it detracts largely from the weight which would otherwise be given to their opinions. Re Storey, 20 Ill. App. 183.

The act of attesting a will solemnly asserts the testator's competency, and a person who, believing that this does not exist, nevertheless signs his name as a witness, becomes an instrument of fraud; and if he subsequently attempts to impeach his own act his evidence, though not positively inadmissible, is of little if any value. Cook's Estate, 16 Phila. 322; McMeekin v. McMeekin, 2 Bush, 79; Cheatnam v. Hatcher, 30 Gratt. 56, 32 Am. Rep. 650; Jones v. Goodrich, 5 Moore, P. C. C. 16.

Especially where he assigns no satisfactory reasons for his opinion. Jones v. Goodrich, 5 Moore, P. C. C. 16.

And it has been held that no weight should be subsequently called, and testified to the execution of the will by the testator. Although the ruling admitting the will in evidence seems to have gone on the footing that its formal execution was as the appellees contended to be assumed, they were not thereby precluded from calling the subscribing witnesses later; and when called they did not cease to be subscribing witness, and examinable as such.

If the appellants had expressly admitted the formal execution of the will, it nevertheless would have been competent for the court to have allowed the appellees to call the subscribing witnesses to testify as such. Com. v. McCarthy, 119 Mass. 354.

We do not see that it was any the less within its power to do so because it had ruled that the formal execution was to be assumed, or that the appellees were to be regarded as having waived the right to call the subscribing witnesses to testify as such because the ruling was as they had contended it should be. Neither the court nor the appellees were limited, in the conduct of the trial, to the phase of the case presented by the ruling.

given to an opinion as to a testator's capacity in a will contest by one who subscribes the will attesting that the testator is of sound mind and memory and then repudiates the attestation under oath. Garrison v. Garrison, 15 N. J. Eq. 208.

And refusal to instruct that certain testimony against the sanity of the testator creates a strong presumption against the validity of the will is not error in a will contest, where the testimony is that of an attesting witness who was also the attending physician of the testator. Thornton v. Thornton, 39 Vt. 122.

And the evidence of one of the attesting witnesses to a will that the testator was not competent will not affect the validity of the will as against testimony of the other in favor of capacity, where it was directly at variance with previous statements made shortly after the will was executed. Cheat-ham v. Hatcher, 30 Gratt. 56, 32 Am. Rep. 650.

So, in Maupin v. Woods, 1 Duv. 223, a will dictated by the testatrix and written out by a disinterested neighbor just as it was dictated was upheld, though the attesting witnesses and their father, at whose house the will was made, expressed the opinion that she was not competent to make a valid will, there being abundant proof, both extrinsic and intrinsic, that she had a disposing mind.

And in Lowe v. Joliffe, 1 W. Bl. 385, a will was established notwithstanding all the subscribing witnesses swore that the testator was utterly incapable where other persons who were with the testator on the day it was made, and two physicians who occasionally attended him, and several others, strongly deposed to his sanity.

And in Digges's Case, cited in Powell on Devises, 710, the person who wrote the testator's will, and who was an attesting witness, swore that the testator was of sound mind, but two other witnesses to the will swore that he was of unsound mind, but the verdict found the will a good testament.

A verdict against a will will not be disturbed, however, though it was natural and was attested by a disinterested physician who testified in favor of testamentary capacity, where the other attesting witnesses testified that the testator was not competent, and that they signed to avoid giving offense, and other witnesses, including another attending physician, testified against capacity. Sydney v. Cunningham, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 34.

And a subscribing witness to a will, who contradicts his own attestation by statements that the testator was incompetent and not in his right senses, may be a good witness to support another subscribing witness with reference to other circumstances. Broome v. Ellis, 2 Lee, Ecol. Rep. 523. F. H. B.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH CABLE COMPANY, App't,
v.

Henry A. EATON.

(170 Ill. 513.)

1. A telegraph line is an additional burden on the fee of a public highway for which compensation must be made to the owner.
2. Ejectment may be maintained to compel the removal of telegraph poles from a public highway over plaintiff's land on which the line constitutes an additional burden for which compensation has not been made to the owner.
3. A transfer of land over which a telegraph line has been constructed without right gives the purchaser all his grantor's rights, including the right to bring ejectment.

(December 22, 1897.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Madison County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of land upon which defendant had erected its poles without authority. Affirmed.

NOTE.—As to ejectment for street, see note to Hancock v. McAvoy (Pa.) 18 L. R. A. 751; also Thomas v. Hunt (Mo.) 32 L. R. A. 337.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William P. Bradshaw, Loesch Brothers & Howell, and Frank J. Loesch, for appellant:

The license from the county commissioners necessarily gave the telegraph company the right to construct its line upon any highway outside of an incorporated city, town, or village between those two points, running in the general direction southwest from New Douglas.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 698.

The license left the telegraph company free to seek any public road most convenient for its line within the directions limited in the consent of the county board.

Edwardsville R. Co. v. Sawyer, 92 Ill. 377.

Messrs. Travous & Warnock, for appellee:

Appellee is the absolute owner of the locus in quo, subject only to the easement in the public to use it for highway purposes. Neither the legislature nor the board of supervisors has the power to authorize appellant to appropriate it without rendering compensation as provided by law.

Craig, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of ejectment brought by Henry A. Eaton, appellee, against the Postal Telegraph Cable Company, for the purpose of compelling the removal of the defendant's line of telegraph poles from a public highway known as the "Edwardsville and Hillsboro Road," which was located over and upon appellee's land. It appears from the record that the Board of Trade Telegraph Company in 1882 constructed its telegraph line over a public highway known as the "Edwardsville & Hillsboro Road" by the consent of the board of supervisors of Madison county, under a resolution of the board adopted at a regular meeting, upon the request of the telegraph company. The resolution granting the right contained the following conditions: Said line shall start at or near New Douglas, and run in a southwest direction, and terminate at or near Venice, in said county, the poles to be set not over 2½ feet from the margin of the road, not to interfere with ditches and water drains; poles to be 18 feet high, and well set and braced, and the wire to be kept tight; and they are to establish but one line, and by them securing the right of way in the several townships. The telegraph company went on and constructed its line under this resolution of the board of supervisors, without, however, obtaining consent or right of way from the land owners along the highway. The Board of Trade Telegraph Company operated its line until 1886, when the line was leased to appellant, the Postal Telegraph Cable Company, and that company has continued to operate the line since that time under its lease. It is not denied that a telegraph company organized under the laws of this state may, under our eminent domain act, acquire property upon which it may erect its telegraph line. Indeed, § 2 of the act relating to telegraph companies (Rev. Stat. 1874, p. 1052) makes provision for such companies to acquire property as follows: "Every such company may enter upon any lands for the purpose of making surveys and examinations with a view to the erection of any telegraph line, and take and damage private property for the erection and maintenance of such lines, and may, subject to the provisions contained in this act, construct lines of telegraph along and upon any railroad, road, highway, street, or alley, along or across any of the waters or land within this state, and may erect poles, posts, piers, or abutments for supporting the insulators, wires, and other necessary fixtures of their lines, in such manner and at such points as not to incommode the public use of the railroad, highway, street, or alley, or interrupt the navigation of such waters." Section 4 of the same act provides: "No such company shall have the right to erect any poles, posts, piers, abutments, wires, or other fixtures of their lines along or upon any road, highway, or public ground outside the corporate limits of a city, town, or village, without the consent of the county board of the county in which such road, highway, or public ground is situated, nor upon any street, alley, or other highway or public ground within any incorporated city, town, or village, without the consent of the corporate authorities of such city, town, or village."

It is contended in the argument that, the county board having given consent to occupy the highway, and the consent having been acted upon, the owner of the fee of the highway cannot maintain an action of ejectment. Where a highway is laid out over lands outside of the incorporated city, town, or village, the public acquires only an easement of passage over the lands, with the rights and incidents thereto, while the owner of the land over which the road is laid out retains the fee and ownership of everything connected with the soil for all purposes not incompatible with the right of the public to a free and unobstructed use of the road as a public highway. Palatine v. Kreuger, 121 Ill. 74. Elliott, in his work on Roads and Streets (p. 519), in the discussion of the question, says: "[The abutter has] the exclusive right to the soil, subject only to the easement of the right of passage in the public and the incidental right of properly fitting the way for use. Subject only to the public easement, the proprietor has all the usual rights and remedies of the owner of a freehold. He may sink a drain below the surface of the road; . . . he may mine under it. So the herbage and trees growing thereon belong to him." At pages 535 and 536 the author says: "He may maintain trespass against one who unlawfully cuts and carries away the grass, trees, or herbage, and even against one who stands upon the sidewalk in front of his premises and uses abusive language towards him, refusing to depart. . . . The abutter may also maintain ejectment against a railroad company which has placed its track upon his side of a street without paying or tendering damages therefor, or against an individual who has wrongfully and unlawfully encroached thereon." In Cole v. Drew, 44 Vt. 49, in considering the question, the court said: "The owner of the soil over which a highway is located is entitled . . . to the entire use of the land, except the right which the public have to use the land and materials thereon for the purpose of building and maintaining a highway, suitable for the safe passage of travelers. This doctrine has been long established." Other cases holding the same doctrine might be cited, but the rule that the owner of the land upon which a public highway is laid out has the exclusive right of the soil, subject to the easement of the right of travel in the public, and the incidental right of keeping the highway in proper repair for the use of the public, is so well established that the citation of other authorities is not deemed necessary. If, then, appellee was the owner of the fee, subject to the easement, as we have seen he was, has he the right to maintain ejectment? In Smith v. Chicago, A. & St. L. R. Co. 67 Ill. 192, it was held that ejectment would lie against a railroad corporation by the owner of the fee for land taken and used by it for the purposes of its road, where the land had not been condemned under proceedings instituted for that purpose in the mode prescribed by law. If an action of ejectment may be maintained against a railroad company, by the owner of the fee whose land has been taken by the railroad company, without instituting proceedings to condemn upon the same ground, no reason occurs to us which would prevent the owner of the fee from maintaining an action of ejectment where possession has been taken by a telegraph company. Indeed, the two cases stand upon the same ground, and if a recovery may be had in the one case, a recovery may also be had in the other. The question whether the owner of the fee of a highway may bring ejectment has arisen in other states, and it has been expressly held that the action will lie. In Terre Haute & S. R. Co. v. Rodel, 46 Am. Rep. 166, 89 Ind. 128, in the discussion of the question, the court said: "The doctrine that the owner of the fee may maintain ejectment for the land covered by a public highway is as old, at least, as Goodtitle, Chester, v. Alker, 1 Burr. 188. Lord Mansfield there said: 'I see no ground why the owner of the soil may not bring ejectment as well as trespass. . . . 'Tis true, . . . he must recover the land subject to the way; but, surely, he ought to have a specific remedy to recover the land itself, notwithstanding its being subject to an easement upon it.'" The court again says (p. 167): "We have no doubt at all as to the right of the owner of the fee to maintain ejectment against a wrongdoer, although the fee is burdened by a public easement. Our own cases, as we have shown, so declare, and so do all the well-considered cases." See also Carpenter v. Oswego & S. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 655; Robert v. Sadler, 104 N. Y. 229, 58 Am. Rep. 498. In Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Hartley, 67 Ill. 439, 16 Am. Rep. 624, it was held, where the public have acquired an easement over a person's land for an ordinary street or highway, the location of the track of a railroad on the same is an additional burden and servitude upon the land, which will entitle the owner to additional compensation; that such an act was an exclusive appropriation by the railroad company of the soil to its own use, which the owner had the right himself to use for any purpose not inconsistent with the public easement, and hence it is taking private property for public use, which cannot be done without making just compensation. In Board of Trade Teleg. Co. v. Barnett, 107 Ill. 507, 47 Am. Rep. 453, an action of trespass was brought by a landowner abutting on a highway, to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the erection of a telegraph line on the highway, and the court held that the construction and maintenance of a telegraph line upon the highway were a new and additional burden on the fee, to which it was not contemplated it should be subjected when the road was laid out, and the owner of the fee was entitled to recover additional compensation for such use. If the construction of the telegraph line was an additional burden on the fee, as the fee belonged to appellee, that burden could not be imposed upon the land unless compensation was made as provided by law.

The appellee here was the owner of the fee, subject to the easement of the public to use the land for a public highway. He had been compensated for this public use, and could make no objection to the right of the public to use the land for a public highway, but no additional burden could be imposed upon the fee without compensation. When appellant, therefore, entered upon and took possession of the land, and erected its line, without instituting proceedings to condemn as required by law, it was a trespasser, and no reason appears why appellee might not sue in trespass, and recover such damages as he had sustained, or bring ejectment, and regain his property in the condition it was in when the appellant entered upon it. But it is said the telegraph company obtained the right to construct its line from the county board of Madison county, and the authority of the county officers to grant a license of this character cannot be questioned in a proceeding of this kind. The consent of the county board of Madison county that the line might be erected on the public highway would, no doubt, be binding on the county and the road authorities in the several towns through which the highway runs upon which the line was authorized to be constructed, but the county board could give no consent which would be binding on any owner of the fee in the highway where the line was constructed. The right of the owner of the fee was beyond the control of the county board. His right is predicated on that provision of the Constitution which declares that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation." Const. art. 2, § 13. The legislature had no authority to confer power on the county board to authorize the appellant company to take appellee's land without compensation, and hence the county board was powerless to give such authority. But it will not be necessary to consider this question further, as it was settled against appellant in Board of Trade Teleg. Co. v. Barnett, 107 Ill. 507, 47 Am. Rep. 453, as will be found upon an examination of that case. It is, however, said that appellee purchased the land after the telegraph line was constructed, with full notice that the line had been constructed, and hence he took the land with the burden upon it. It is no doubt true that appellee purchased the land subject to all rights appellant possessed in it, but the trouble with appellant is, by taking possession without making compensation to the owner of the fee, it acquired no rights against such owner, and when appellee purchased he acquired all the rights in the land possessed by his grantor, and, if his grantor was entitled to bring ejectment, this right passed to appellee. Whether appellee could maintain trespass, or whether he would be barred by the statute of limitations, had such an action been brought, is a question not presented by this record. The sole question here is the right of appellee to maintain ejectment.

The circuit court held that he had this right, and we think the judgment correct, and it will be affirmed.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

FRANKLIN NATIONAL BANK et al.,

Appls.,

v.

William C. WHITEHEAD et al.

(.....Ind.....)

1. Only such corporations as are authorized by the law under which they are organized to carry on the business of warehousemen can avail themselves of the provisions of the Indiana act of 1875, as amended 1879, entitling "any person or incorporated company" to obtain a permit to keep a public warehouse.
2. One who is not a warehouseman cannot give a valid warehouse receipt upon his own property, in his own possession, to secure his own debt.
3. A public warehouseman cannot issue warehouse receipts upon its own property, in its own possession, and deliver them as a pledge to secure its own indebtedness.
4. A warehouse receipt is subject to a statute respecting the acknowledgment and recording of an assignment of goods by way of mortgage, when the receipt is issued by a debtor upon his own property, in his own possession, as a pledge to secure his debt.
5. A special finding to sustain an estoppel must clearly state the facts, leaving nothing to intendment.
6. The doctrine of estoppel does not apply to contracts which are forbidden by statute or contrary to public policy.
7. A corporation is not estopped from denying that it is a warehouseman or that its receipts, as such, are valid as against a holder of them who took them with knowledge of the facts respecting the character and powers of the corporation.
8. A general creditor has the right to intervene in case of a receivership, and contest the validity, as well as the priority, of other claims or asserted liens.
9. A receiver may avoid an assignment of goods by way of mortgage made by a corporation, on the ground that it was not recorded within the time required by law in order to make it valid, "as against any other person than the parties."

denying their claim to a lien on property of the Greenfield Iron & Nail Company which had been placed in the hands of a receiver. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Baker & Daniels, for appellants:

The position of the receiver and the general creditor in this proceeding is no better than the position of the debtor.

Union Trust Co. v. Trumbull, 137 Ill. 146; Warner v. Jameson, 52 Iowa, 70.

The position of the receiver is no better than the position of the debtor except fraud be proved. He takes subject to all liens and equities.

Where a cause of action depends upon the establishment of fraud, the special finding must state that there was fraud.

Phelps v. Smith, 116 Ind. 387.

Fraud is an ultimate fact which must be found as a substantive fact in a special finding, and it will never be presumed.

A finding that the Greenfield Iron & Nail Company was guilty of a fraudulent act or had a fraudulent purpose would not be sufficient to impeach the bona fides of the transaction as against the Rockville Bank.

Old Nat. Bank v. Findley, 131 Ind. 225.

It is not seemly for a corporation, any more than for an individual, to make a contract and then break it at its own pleasure; to abide by it so long as it is advantageous and repudiate it when it becomes onerous.

Monks, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In January, 1894, in a proceeding brought for that purpose, the court below appointed a receiver for the Greenfield Iron & Nail Company, an insolvent corporation, located at Greenfield, Indiana, who took possession of the 39 L. R. A.

property of said corporation under the order of the court, for the purpose of applying its assets to the payment of its debts. Appellants, two of the creditors of said corporation, filed their separate intervening petitions, claiming that, by virtue of certain receipts, purporting to be public warehouse receipts, issued by said corporation, they had liens upon a large portion of the property of said corporation, and were entitled to have the same set apart and applied to the payment of their claims. To these intervening petitions the receiver and the First National Bank of Brazil, on behalf of themselves and the other general creditors, filed separate answers. The court made a special finding of facts, upon which conclusions of law were stated against the Franklin National Bank and the National Bank of Rockville, intervening petitioners, and, over their separate motions for a new trial, judgment was rendered against them.

The errors assigned call in question each conclusion of law and the action of the court in overruling the motions for a new trial.

It appears from the special finding that the Greenfield Iron & Nail Company was organized on November 3, 1899, under the laws for the incorporation of manufacturing and mining companies, having its office and principal place of business at the city of Greenfield, Indiana. The object of said corporation, as set forth in its articles of association, was "the manufacture and sale of nails and other products of steel and iron." In December, 1890, said company made a written application to the auditor of Hancock county for a permit to keep a public warehouse, and received a paper purporting to authorize it to operate a public warehouse of class B. Said company never owned or operated a public warehouse of either class A or B, or pretended to, other than the room used in the manufacture of nails, never received any goods, wares, or merchandise on storage, or owned or leased a place for the storage of goods, and never issued any papers purporting to be warehouse receipts, except the papers so designated in this case, and a similar one to one of appellants, the Franklin National Bank, in a transaction similar to the one in which said bank received the papers mentioned in its intervening petition. The effort of said Greenfield Iron & Nail Company to occupy the position of a warehouseman was to enable it to borrow money without impairing its credit by giving chattel mortgages or making pledges of its stock. While the company was engaged in carrying on its business, the nails manufactured were put in kegs, and upon the head of each keg was branded the name of the company and the kind and size of nails contained therein, and the kegs were placed in rows on one side of the room where made. Prior to December 9, 1890, the Greenfield Iron & Nail Company, by its president, applied to appellant the Franklin National Bank for a loan of $5,000, and promised to secure said loan by giving as collateral security therefor a warehouse receipt covering nails of sufficient value belonging to said company; and on the 9th of December, 1890, said bank loaned said company $5,000, for which said company executed its note, payable 120 days after date, indorsed by five persons; and it was required that said company should ship and store said nails in a regular warehouse in Indianapolis. Afterwards, in January, 1891, said company made out a statement showing the sale of 870 kegs of nails and the size and kind of nails in each keg, to said bank, valued at $5,009.95, and at the same time made out a receipt which recited that the Greenfield Iron & Nail Company, in its capacity of a public warehouseman, hereby certifies that it has received of the Franklin National Bank the following described property (describing the kegs of nails the same as in the invoice aforesaid, except no value is mentioned, and the words "marked 'Lot A.'" were used), which is deliverable to the order of said Franklin National Bank upon the return of "this receipt and the payment or tender of proper charges." This receipt was signed by the company. Both of these papers were delivered by said company to the bank for the purpose of complying with its promise to secure said note. Afterwards, in April and May, 1891, loans were made by the National Bank of Rockville to said company, under like arrangements and condition, to secure which like papers, except the kegs of nails, were not designated as being marked "Lot A" or otherwise, were executed and delivered to the National Bank of Rockville. Afterwards, in July, 1893, the company executed and delivered to the Rockville Bank, as additional security for said loans, papers of like kind for "800 kegs of cut steel nails, 10 d com." No nails were in fact sold by said company to either of said banks, and said bank made no actual deposit of nails with the company, but said company, at the times said papers were delivered, had in its general stock, in its manufacturing establishment at Greenfield, nails of the kind described in said receipts. The failure of said company to ship the nails to Indianapolis, as agreed with the Franklin National Bank, was not known or assented to until said receipt and invoice were received and accepted by said bank, about February 1, 1891. The nails described in said several receipts were not removed from the room where manufactured, and were not set apart or separated from the general stock then on hand of the same and different kinds, nor were they marked "A," or in any other manner except in common with all other nails manufactured by the company. The bank officers of said banks did not know the method of manufacture and storage of said nails or the kind of places where stored, or that said nails, described in the receipt of the Franklin National Bank, had not been set apart and marked "Lot A" as indicated in said receipt to the Franklin National Bank. Nor did they make any inquiry or effort to ascertain the character of the pretended warehouse at Greenville, or whether said nails were stored therein or at any other place, or as to what had been done or was being done with respect to said nails, but wholly relied upon said receipts. The loans evidenced by said notes were renewed from time to time by giving other notes with the same indorsers, and the same were accepted by the banks in reliance upon the papers held, respectively, as security for said loans. After the execution of said receipts the Greenfield Iron & Nail

Company continued to manufacture nails, and when so manufactured the kegs in which they were placed were mingled indiscriminately with other kegs containing nails of a similar kind on hand at the dates of the execution of said receipts to said banks, and kept in the company's building, and sales were made by the company from time to time, and the nails sold were taken indiscriminately from the stock on hand, and no effort was made to distinguish between the nails on hand when said receipts were executed and those subsequently made. At the time of the execution and acceptance of said receipts the nail company and the appellants intended to create a valid lien on the nails therein described as collateral security for said loans. On January 4, 1894, the president of the Greenfield Iron & Nail Company gave directions that nails of the same kind and quality specified in the receipts held by said banks, respectively, be set apart and marked for said banks. On said day the company, to secure the Franklin National Bank a lien on said nails, without the knowledge of said bank, commenced to set apart nails of the same kind and quality and description as those mentioned in the receipt given to said bank, so far as they were on hand, and the same were placed in piles and separated from other nails, and the piles so set apart were designated as "Lot I." This was completed on January 13, 1894, before the appointment of a receiver. It cannot be determined how many of the nails, if any, so set apart were on hand when said receipt was given to said bank. No nails were set apart for the Rockville Bank for the lack of time, as the receiver was appointed immediately after the completion of the work of setting apart the nails designated "Lot I." At the time the order was given to set apart said nails, on January 12, 1894, the Greenfield Iron & Nail Company was insolvent and in embarrassed circumstances, and was unable to meet or pay the claims against it, and when said order was given the officers of said company well knew that said company could not continue in business, and said order was made in contemplation and expectation of the appointment of a receiver, and that the same would be wound up as an insolvent concern.

The receiver was appointed on January 13, 1894, and took possession of the property of said company, including the nails, in separate piles designated as "Lot I," but in resorting the nails in order to take an invoice, and in removing them from exposure to the weather, the nails in said piles were mingled with other nails of the same kind in the building. No warehouse charges for storage or other expense was charged by said company against the holder of said receipts, nor was any scale or schedule of charges ever fixed or adopted by said company.

To constitute a valid pledge, there must be an actual or symbolical delivery of possession of the thing pledged, and, to preserve the pledge, the pledgee must retain the possession of the property. Ordinarily the physical possession of the property is delivered to and retained by the pledgee. If, however, the property is delivered by the owner to a warehouseman, and a warehouse receipt is given therefor by the warehouseman, the indorsement of the warehouse receipt, and the delivery thereof to the pledgee, is regarded in law as the delivery of possession to the pledgee of the property described in the warehouse receipt. Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 9716, 8722, 8729 (Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, §§ 6537, 6548, 6550); Hale, Bailments & Carriers, 127; Jones, Pledges, §§ 23, 280, 281, 287.

The first question to be determined is whether the Greenfield Iron & Nail Company was authorized to engage in the business of public warehouseman, and as such issue warehouse receipts. The special finding shows that said Greenfield Iron & Nail Company was organized under the laws for the incorporation of manufacturing and mining companies, and that its object, as stated in the articles of association, was to manufacture and sell nails and other products of steel and iron. A corporation possesses only such powers as are expressly given by law, and such implied powers as are necessary to enable them to exercise the powers expressly given. State Bd. of Agri. v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 47 Ind. 407, 409, 17 Am. Rep. 702; Clark, Corp. 120. The business of public warehouseman was not necessary or incidental to the business of said company in manufacturing or selling nails or other products of steel or iron. It is evident that such company was not authorized, by the laws under which it was organized, to engage in the business of public warehouseman or to issue warehouse receipts. It is insisted, however, by appellants, that as said company made a written application to the auditor of Hancock county, and obtained a permit from him to carry on the business of public warehouseman under the provisions of § 8704, Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894 (Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, § 6525), it was fully authorized by said section to carry on that business and issue warehouse receipts. The section referred to is the 1st section of the public warehouse act of 1875, as amended in 1879, and the part relied upon by appellants is as follows: "Any person or incorporated company desiring to keep any such public warehouse shall be entitled to do so upon receiving a permit therefor from the auditor of the county in which such warehouse shall be kept." If appellants' construction of said section is the correct one, then all the corporations in the state, whether educational, charitable, religious, commercial, or otherwise, whatever may be the provisions of the law under which organized, are given the right of going into and carrying on the business of public warehousemen. While the language quoted from said section is very broad, it was certainly not the intention of the legislature to confer on all the corporations in the state, without regard to the law under which they were organized, and the purposes and objects of their organization, the privileges of public warehousemen. As well hold that persons without capacity to contract on account of infancy, insanity, or other disqualifications were, by said statute, authorized to engage in the business of public warehousemen and execute valid warehouse receipts. A "warehouseman" is defined to be the owner of a warehouse; one who, as a business and for hire, keeps and stores the goods of others. Black, Law Dict. A person who receives goods and merchandise to be stored in his warehouse for hire. Bouvier, Law Dict.; 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 686, 687; Edwards, Bailm. § 332; Hale, Bailments & Carriers, 288. Only such corporations as are authorized by the law under which they are organized to carry on the business of warehouseman can avail themselves of the provisions of said act of 1875 (Acts 1875, p. 172), as amended by the act of 1879 (Acts 1879, p. 230, being Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 8704, 8719; Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, §§ 6525, 6540). It follows that said nail company was not authorized to operate as a public warehouseman, or issue any warehouse receipts, under the provision of said act of 1875, as amended by the act of 1879.

Appellants insist that, if the nail company could not become a public warehouseman, then its acts, as stated in the special finding, made it a private warehouseman, under the act of 1879 (Acts 1879, p. 231; Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 8720-8729; Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, §§ 6541-6550); and the receipts issued to appellants are sufficient, in equity, to carry out the intent of the nail company and appellants, by creating in appellants a lien upon the nails described in said receipts. Section 8720 (6541), supra, provides that "every person, firm, company, or corporation receiving cotton, tobacco, pork, grain, corn, rye, oats, wheat, hemp, whisky, coal, any kind of produce, wares, merchandise, commodity, or any other kind or description of personal property or thing whatever, in store, or undertaking to receive or take care of the same, with or without compensation or reward therefor, shall be deemed and held to be a warehouseman." Said nail company was not authorized by the law under which it was organized to engage in the business of private warehouseman any more than it was authorized to carry on the business of public warehouseman, and the special findings show that the said nail company never received any goods, wares, or merchandise or other property on store from anyone, and that it was not engaged in business as a warehouseman, and never had been, and did not operate a warehouse, and that no receipts were ever issued by it, except to said appellants. It is clear from the finding that the nail company never in fact kept a warehouse to store goods in, and was not engaged in business as a public or private warehouseman, nor was it authorized to engage in such business. In Sinsheimer v. Whitely, 111 Cal. 378, the court said: "It is only persons who pursue the calling of warehousemen—that is, receive and store goods in a warehouse as a business for profit—that have power to issue a technical warehouse receipt, the transfer of which is a good delivery of the goods represented by it." Shepardson v. Cary, 29 Wis. 42; Butcher v. Com. 103 Pa. 594; Edwards, Bailm. § 332. In Minnesota, where the rule that a warehouseman can pledge his own goods in his warehouse to secure an indebtedness, by issuing a warehouse receipt to the pledgee, prevails, it is held that one who is not a warehouseman cannot give a valid warehouse receipt upon his own property, in his own possession, to secure his own debt. National Exch. Bank v. Wilder, 34 Minn. 149, 155, 157; Fishback v. Van Dusen, 83 Minn.

111. In the case in 34 Minn. and cited, the court said: "The owner of goods, if a warehouseman, can pledge the same by issuing and delivering his own warehouse receipt to the pledgee. . . . When the pledgee or the vendor is a warehouseman, the public has notice from that fact that the title and legal possession of property in his warehouse may be in others, although the actual physical possession is in himself." In Geiffuss v. Corrigan, 95 Wis. 651, 37 L. R. A. 166, one Schleisinger owned two corporations,—one the Buffalo Mining Company, a mining corporation engaged in mining ore in Michigan; the other the Douglas Furnace Company engaged in smelting ore in Pennsylvania. The furnace company had a large stock of pig iron constantly on hand in its yards in Pennsylvania. In order to raise money for the furnace company, Schleisinger caused the furnace company to issue apparent storage receipts to the mining company, without consideration and without agreement to purchase, and without selection or delivery, and with the agreement that the receipts should be returned whenever the furnace company needed them on account of sale of iron. On receiving the receipts, he borrowed money of the plaintiff bank upon the notes of the mining company, secured by assignment of the receipts as collateral. The plaintiff bank took said receipts innocently, and without knowledge of any defect. The court said: "In order to be such [warehouse receipts] they must be issued by a warehouseman or one openly engaged in the business of storing property for others for a compensation. Bucher v. Com. 103 Pa. 528; Shepardson v. Cary, 29 Wis. 34. And the fact that the receipt was executed by a warehouseman must affirmatively appear in the evidence. Shepardson v. Cary, 29 Wis. 34. Not only was there no proof in this case that the furnace company was in the warehousing or storage business, but, on the contrary, the proof was conclusive that it was not in such business, and never had been. The fact that it surreptitiously issued the false receipts in question did not constitute a warehousing corporation. As well might it be argued that the issuance of counterfeit bank bills constitutes the counterfeiter a bank. It seems that, had the certificates been negotiable warehouse receipts, the bank would have acquired a valid lien upon the iron they represented by the transfer and indorsement of the receipts to it by the Buffalo Mining Company. But we may dismiss this question, because they were not such certificates, and the plaintiff obtains no advantage from the fact that they were in the usual form thereof. Nor were the certificates valid as chattel mortgages upon the iron named in them, not only because they were not chattel mortgages in legal effect, but also because, by the law of Pennsylvania, as well as by the law of Wisconsin, a chattel mortgage is only valid as to third persons when filed in the proper recorder's office, and there is no claim of any filing here." The private warehouse act of this state (Acts 1879, p. 231; Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 8720-8729 [Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, §§ 6541-6550]), is substantially the same as the warehouse act of March 6, 1869, of the state of Kentucky, and was no doubt taken from that act. In Mechanics' Trust Co. v. Dandridge, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 625, Dandridge gave a receipt purporting to be a warehouse receipt for property left in his possession, which receipt was pledged to Mason, Gooch, & Hodge Co. by its holder as collateral security for a debt, and the Kentucky court of appeals, in construing said statute, held that the same was not a warehouse receipt, and that Mason, Gooch, & Hodge Co. had no lien at all on the property. The court said: "The statute evidently refers to only such persons as in fact keep a warehouse to store goods in and are engaged in that business. It cannot be that it was the intention of the legislature to provide that any and all persons might become legal warehousemen by simply receiving one particular piece of property in store and issuing a receipt therefor. There is no pretense that Dandridge was engaged in keeping a warehouse and storing property therein as a business. It therefore follows that the receipt in question was and is invalid and ineffectual, and the indorsement thereof passed no interest in the property. It is, as a general rule, indispensable, that possession must accompany the pledge of property in order to vest the pledgee with title or interest therein. . . . It is, therefore, perfectly manifest that there was no change of possession and nothing to warn the public of any change. . . . If appellee [Mason, Gooch, & Hodge Co.] desired to acquire a lien on the property it could have done so by obtaining a mortgage, and then it would have been secure, and no other creditor need to have been misled. It is not necessary to discuss the question of notice, because appellees have no lien at all on the property, and it is wholly immaterial whether appellant knew of the receipt or not." It follows that, even if the nail company was authorized by statute to engage in business as a private warehouseman, it not having done so, said receipts, even if they purported to be issued by it as a private warehouseman, would be invalid and ineffectual, and would not create a lien on the property described therein. Besides, we do not think that the nail company had any power or authority to issue warehouse receipts upon its own property, in its own possession, and deliver the same as a pledge to secure an indebtedness, even if it was engaged in business as a public warehouseman, and was fully authorized by the law to carry on such business. Such a receipt would not, in a technical sense, be a warehouse receipt, and even if between the parties it created a lien, as to which we need not and do not decide, it would be void as against all other persons, under § 10 of the act for the prevention of frauds and perjuries, being § 6638, Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894 (Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, § 4913), which provides that "no assignment of goods by way of mortgage shall be valid against any other person than the parties thereto, when such goods are not delivered to the mortgagee or assignee and retained by them, unless such assignment or mortgage shall be acknowledged as provided in case of deeds of conveyance, and be recorded in the recorder's office of the county where the mortgagor resides within ten days after the execution thereof." Saint Joseph Hydraulic Co. v. Wilson, 133 Ind. 465, 474. It may be true, as claimed by appellants, that a private warehouseman is authorized by § 5 of the act of 1879, p. 281, being § 8724, Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894 (Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, § 6545), to issue warehouse receipts for his own property actually in store and under his control at the time of giving the receipt. The entire act, of which said § 8724 (6545), supra, forms a part, seems to have been taken from the statute of Kentucky, and the court of last resort in that state has held that said section authorizes a warehouseman to issue warehouse receipts upon his own property in the manner and under the conditions provided in said act. Cochran v. Rippy, 18 Bush, 495; Ferguson v. Northern Bank, 14 Bush, 555, 29 Am. Rep. 418. If a private warehouseman has such authority in this state, it is by virtue of said § 8724 (6545), supra, and without said section he would have no such power. Jones, Pledges, § 825; Hale, Bailments & Carriers, p. 128. Said act, however, is distinct in form and purpose from the public warehouse act of 1875, as amended March 29, 1879 (Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 8704-8719 [Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, §§ 6525-6540]), and said acts are entirely independent of each other. Miller v. State, 144 Ind. 401, 404. It is clear that said section does not authorize a public warehouseman to issue warehouse receipts on his own property, nor is there anything in the public warehouse act which authorizes it. It follows that a public warehouseman would have no more power to issue a warehouse receipt upon his own property in his warehouse, as security for a debt, unless there was a statute expressly authorizing it, than would a debtor who is not a warehouseman. Where a debtor who is not a warehouseman issues a receipt purporting to be a warehouse receipt, on property in his possession and owned by him, for the sole purpose of securing a creditor, the same is not in any sense a warehouse receipt. Conrad v. Fischer, 87 Mo. App. 352, 8 L. R. A. 147; Mechanics' Trust Co. v. Dandridge, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 625; Sinsheimer v. Whiteley, 111 Cal. 378; Geiffuss v. Corrigan, 95 Wis. 651, 17 L. R. A. 166; National Exch. Bank v. Wilder, 84 Minn. 149; Steubli v. Blaine Nat. Bank, 11 Wash. 426; Thorne v. First Nat. Bank, 37 Ohio St. 254; Union Trust Co. v. Trumbull, 137 Ill. 146, 164; Jones, Pledges, §§ 325, 326. In Union Trust Co. v. Trumbull, 137 Ill. 146, T. W. Hall & Co., merchants and factors in wool, issued a receipt for their own wool in their own possession to one Velh Meyer, as security for money borrowed from him, and the court held that he was not entitled to a lien on the wool described in said receipts. The court on page 164, 137 Ill., said: "His claim is based on a receipt issued by Hall & Co., who were not public warehousemen, and which was therefore of no more effect as a lien than a certificate issued by any other property owner. It is only where property is stored in a public warehouse that a receipt may be given which will evidence a lien upon the property." In Thorne v. First Nat. Bank, 37 Ohio St. 254, it was held that an instrument, substantially like a warehouse receipt, issued to a creditor by a debtor, who was not a warehouseman, on his own property, for the sole purpose of securing the creditor, was void as against other creditors, when the property remained in the possession of the debtor, for the reason that it was an attempt to create a lien upon personal property contrary to the provisions of the statute making chattel mortgages void if not accompanied by delivery of possession unless the mortgage, or a copy thereof, was deposited in the office of the officer named in the statute.

It is insisted, however, by appellants, that the nail company is estopped from denying that it was a warehouseman, and that it held as such the nails mentioned in the receipts, for and subject to their order. We do not think the nail company was estopped as claimed by appellants. It is true, as urged by appellants, that when a person is carrying on the business of warehouseman, public or private, under our statutes, and he issues warehouse receipts which comply with the requirements of the statutes under which he is operating his warehouse, and the person to whom said receipts have been issued indorses to innocent holders for value, that the warehouseman is estopped from denying that he holds the goods described on the terms specified in the receipts; but this rule has no application here, for the reason that it is not shown by the special finding that the nail company is a public or private warehouseman, or that it was engaged in such business or had any power to do so, or that said receipts have been indorsed to an innocent holder, but the special finding shows that said company was not a warehouseman, public or private, and never had been, and had no power to engage in such business or issue warehouse receipts. The rule is that, to constitute a valid estoppel by conduct, there must be knowledge on the part of the person to be estopped, and a want of knowledge on the part of the party relying on the estoppel, and there can be no estoppel when there is notice or knowledge on the part of the person relying upon the estoppel. First Nat. Bank v. Williams, 126 Ind. 423, 429, 430; Buck v. Milford, 90 Ind. 291-298, and cases cited; Stewart v. Beck, 90 Ind. 458.

If the nail company could be estopped as insisted by appellants, it would only be, if at all, when appellants had no notice or knowledge that the nail company was not a warehouseman, and was not engaged in such business, and had no power to engage in such business or issue warehouse receipts, but believed in good faith that it was engaged in such business, and had the power to do so and issue warehouse receipts, and that, relying upon such facts, they accepted the receipts and made the loan on the faith thereof. To sustain the estoppel claimed by appellants against the nail company, the facts necessary to constitute the same must be clearly stated in the special finding, leaving nothing to intentment. First Nat. Bank v. Williams, 126 Ind. 430. No such facts are stated in the special finding, but, on the contrary, so far as the special finding shows, appellants knew that the nail company was engaged in the manufacture of nails, and that it was organized under the laws for the incorporation of manufacturing and mining companies, and was not a warehouseman, public or private, and never had been, and was not authorized to carry on such business or issue such receipts. Besides, they were bound to know that, under our statutes, a corporation, organized under the law for the incorporation of manufacturing and mining companies, had no power to carry on either a public or private warehouse or issue warehouse receipts; and that a public warehouseman had no authority to issue warehouse receipts on his own property in his public warehouse, as a security for his own debts or the debts of others.

It is insisted by appellants that if the nail company was not authorized to be a public warehouseman, and had no right to issue public warehouse receipts on its own property to secure its own debts, its acts in doing so were merely ultra vires, and, as such contracts have been performed by appellants in loaning said nail company the money, that, after receiving the benefits of the contract, it cannot avoid such warehouse receipts on the ground that it has exceeded its corporate powers in issuing them. There is much conflict in the decisions of courts of last resort as to the doctrine urged, but in the jurisdictions where it prevails the rule is that when a corporation enters into a contract merely beyond its powers, which, if made by a private person, would have been binding upon him, and such contract has been performed by the other party thereto, the corporation will not be permitted to deny its power to make such contract, but the same may be enforced against it. It would seem that what we have already said in regard to the nail company being estopped to deny that it was a warehouseman, and had the power to issue said receipts and hold said nails for appellants, is a sufficient answer to this contention of appellants, but we think there are also other reasons why such contention cannot prevail. But, as we have shown, a public warehouseman, whether a corporation or an individual, cannot issue a public warehouse receipt on his own property, in such warehouse, as security for his own debts or the debts of others, and such receipt, if issued, creates no lien on such property. The rule urged cannot, therefore, apply to this case, even if it were conceded that the nail company was authorized by law to engage in the business of public warehouseman, and was actually engaged in such business. Besides, the doctrine urged does not apply to contracts where the same are forbidden by statute or are contrary to public policy. State Bd. of Agri. v. Citizens' Street R. Co., 47 Ind. 407, 411, 17 Am. Rep. 702; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 878. As we have shown, any attempt by any person to create a lien on his personal property, except in the manner provided in § 10 of the statute for the prevention of frauds and perjuries, is void, and, if by an assignment by way of mortgage, the same, unless recorded within ten days after its execution, is void as to all persons except the parties thereto. As there was no law authorizing the nail company to issue said receipts, and thus create a lien on said personal property, the creation of a lien in that manner is expressly forbidden by section 10 of the act for the prevention of frauds and perjuries, being § 6638 (4913), supra. Saint Joseph Hydraulic Co. v. Wilson, 138 Ind. 474. It is clear that the only interest appellants can claim in said nails under said receipts is that of a lien thereon as pledgees. To make a valid pledge, there must have been either an actual or constructive delivery of the property described in the receipts. Good faith does not make good a pledge unless there has been a delivery and possession, either actual or constructive. The special finding shows that there was no actual delivery when the receipts were executed. There was no delivery unless the delivery of the receipts to appellants was a constructive delivery. If the nail company had been a warehouseman, and authorized to issue said receipts, upon its own property, and they had in all respects conformed to the requirements of our statutes, the delivery thereof, as collateral security to secure said loans, might have been sufficient constructive delivery. But this rule, as we have shown, does not apply to property in the possession of the pledgeor, who is not a warehouseman, and in such case the delivery of the receipts is not a constructive delivery of the property described in the receipts. Shepardson v. Cary, 29 Wis. 84; Geilfuss v. Corrigan, 95 Wis. 651, 87 L. R. A. 166. The setting apart of the nails described in the receipt to the appellant the Franklin National Bank, just before the appointment of a receiver, was without the knowledge of said bank, and was not a delivery to said bank, nor did said bank then or at any time take or have possession of said nails. As there was no actual or constructive delivery of the nails to appellants, and they never had actual or constructive possession thereof, they had no lien thereon as pledgees. There is no mode under the law of this state, except by chattel mortgage, duly acknowledged and recorded, by which the owner of personal property, retaining its possession, can give another a lien upon it that can be enforced against any person except the parties thereto. Saint Joseph Hydraulic Co. v. Wilson, 138 Ind. 474. There having been no delivery of possession, actual or constructive, of said property, said receipts, even if valid as to the nail company and appellants, were void as to third parties, under § 10 of the act for the prevention of frauds and perjuries, being § 6638 (4913), supra. It will be observed that under said section an assignment of mortgaged goods as security is only valid as to the parties thereto, and is void as to all other persons, while in many of the other states it is only void as to creditors and purchasers for value without notice. In Saint Joseph Hydraulic Co. v. Wilson, 138 Ind. 474, this court, in speaking of equitable and other liens, where there was no delivery and retention of possession of the property upon which the lien was claimed, said: "But in each there is that feature of an assignment of goods" which, "as against any other person than the parties," renders it invalid under our statute, unless acknowledged and recorded. The cases of Kennedy v. Shaw, 38 Ind. 474; Lockwood v. Slevin, 26 Ind. 124; Ross v. Menefee, 125 Ind. 432; Scarry v. Bennett, 3 Ind. App. 167; Boone, Mortg. § 258, notes 14, 15,—establish the invalidity of such an assignment of goods, even as to third persons with actual notice of the lien. This court held in Granger v. Adams, 90 Ind. 87, "that one who asserts a right under such an instrument paramount to the claims of creditors, must show that all has been done that the statute requires." Under said section, therefore, an assignment of goods by way of mortgage, if not recorded within ten days after its execution, is void as against a subsequent purchaser, even though he had actual notice thereof. Ross v. Menefee, 125 Ind. 482; Saint Joseph Hydraulic Co. v. Wilson, 133 Ind. 474, 475; Stengel v. Boyce, 143 Ind. 642, 646, and cases cited; Granger v. Adams, 90 Ind. 87; Kennedy v. Shaw, 88 Ind. 474. Such an assignment of goods is also void as against an assignee under a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, and it is his duty to take advantage of the failure to record the same in ten days after its execution. Lockwood v. Stevin, 26 Ind. 125, 128; Saint Joseph Hydraulic Co. v. Wilson, 133 Ind. 474; Haines v. Tiffany, 25 Ohio St. 549; Blandy v. Benedict, 42 Ohio St. 295; Thorne v. First Nat. Bank, 37 Ohio St. 254; Bingham v. Jordan, 1 Allen, 373, 79 Am. Dec. 748; Adams v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 9 Biss. 396, 403, 2 Fed. Rep. 174; 2 Cobbey, Chat. Mortg. § 619; Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 814, and cases cited. The assignee is regarded as representing and standing in the place of the creditors, as well as the assignor, and he therefore has the right to contest claims and the rights to property which the assignor did not possess. Lockwood v. Stevin, 26 Ind. 124; Voorhees v. Carpenter, 127 Ind. 800, 301, and cases cited; Cooper v. Perdue, 114 Ind. 207; Seibert v. Milligan, 110 Ind. 106; Hasseld v. Seyfort, 105 Ind. 534; Adams v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 9 Biss. 396. The assignment is made for the benefit of creditors, and the assignee holds the property in trust for them, and as such he can enforce any right and reach any property that a general creditor could enforce either before or after obtaining judgment and execution, in case there had been no assignment. Lockwood v. Stevin, 26 Ind. 124; Kilbourne v. Fay, 29 Ohio St. 264, 278, 279, 23 Am. Rep. 741; Hanes v. Tiffany, 25 Ohio St. 549; Adams v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 9 Biss. 396. It is clear from the language of § 6638 (4913), supra, that as such trustee for the creditors he is not a party to any assignment of personal property by way of mortgage made by the assignor, within the meaning of said section. If an unrecorded assignment of goods by way of mortgage is void as against the assignee for the benefit of creditors, for the same reason it is also void as against a receiver of an insolvent corporation. When a court has taken possession of the property of an insolvent corporation for administration, and appointed a receiver, the property of the corporation is a trust fund for the payment of its debts. First Nat. Bank v. Donetail Body & G. Co. 143 Ind. 534, 542, 543, and cases cited; Id. 143 Ind. 550, 553, 554; Henderson v. Indiana Trust Co. 143 Ind. 561; Graham Button Co. v. Spielmann, 50 N. J. Eq. 120. And a general creditor has a lien upon such property, and therefore has the right to intervene and contest the validity as well as the priority of other claims or asserted liens. Farmers' Loan

As trustee representing the creditors of an insolvent corporation, he is not, therefore, a party to an assignment of goods made by the corporation to secure an indebtedness within the meaning of § 6638 (4913), supra. As such trustee, representing the creditors, he may avoid an assignment of goods by way of a mortgage made by the corporation, on the ground that it was not recorded within the time required by law. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Minneapolis Engine & Mach. Works, 35 Minn. 543; Rudd v. Robinson, 54 Hun, 389, 346, 348; Graham Button Co. v. Spielmann, 50 N. J. Eq. 120; Hopper v. Lovejoy, 47 N. J. Eq. 573, 12 L. R. A. 588; Gluck & B. Receivers, p. 168; Beach, Receivers, Alderson's ed. 726; 5 Thomp. Corp. § 6952.

It is clear, therefore, even if said receipts created a lien on said nails as against the nail company, that they were void as to the general creditors and the receiver as trustee for them, and that the general creditors could reach the same through the receiver and by intervening petitions, the same as the general creditors could have done after levying writs of attachment thereon, or after obtaining judgment and execution, if there had been no receivership. Appellees claim that, as the receipts did not state any distinguishing marks, they were invalid. The public warehouse law requires that "all warehouse receipts for property stored in public warehouses of class B shall distinctly state on their face the brand or distinguishing mark on such property." Such receipts must so describe the property that it can be identified by such description from other property of like kind. The private warehouse law contains a like requirement. The view we have taken of this case renders it unnecessary for us to determine whether or not the description of the property contained in the receipts complied with the law. We have read the evidence, and the same sustains the finding of the trial court. It follows from what we have said that the court did not err in its conclusions of law, nor in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

James HOLLENBECK, Appt.,

v.

P. E. HALL.

(.....Iowa.....)

It is not libelous to publish of a debtor that he pleaded the statute of limitations in an action on the claim, under Code 1873, § 4097, defining libel to be the malicious defamation of a person made public by writing, tending to provoke him to wrath, or expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or to deprive him of the benefits of public confidence and social intercourse; and the publication is not rendered libelous by characterizing such conduct on his part as dishonest.

(October 15, 1897.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court of Cedar Rapids in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged publication of a libel. Affirmed.

Statement by Ladd, J.:

The plaintiff alleged in his petition that "on or about the 1st day of June, 1898, the defendant, P. E. Hall, for the purpose of injuring the good name and reputation of the plaintiff herein, and to expose to the public hatred, contempt, and ridicule, and to deprive him of the benefit of public confidence and social intercourse, did publish of and concerning the plaintiff the following false, libelous, and defamatory matter, to wit:

Cedar Rapids, Iowa, Dec. 7, 1892.

P. E. Hall, Pres. C. R. & M. C. Ry. Co., Cedar Rapids, Iowa—Dear Sir: For some years past, one of your old and trusty conductors, Mr. James Hollenbeck, has owed us a bill for professional services rendered his family in the way of consultations with his family physician at his home, in Marlon. His attention has been repeatedly called to the subject but to no purpose. We finally sued him, to which he responds by employing an attorney, and contesting the claim. Having no other defense, he cowardly sinks behind that of statutory limitation. Such a course is not exactly in accordance with our idea of strict integrity. So far as we are concerned, we would prefer not to be connected in an official capacity with a corporation giving employment to men of this character; especially when permitted to occupy positions of trust.

Yours courteously,

H. & J. M. Ristine.

Then follows a denial in detail of the statements contained in the letter, the allegations that it was published by mailing copies to persons named, and that plaintiff has been damaged to the sum of $5,000, for which amount judgment is prayed. No special damages are alleged. To this petition the defendant demurred in these words: "(1) No sufficient publication of the alleged libel is shown to render the defendant liable. (2) The alleged letter or publication set out in the petition is not libelous or actionable, even if published." It is not libelous to charge plaintiff with having availed himself of the statute of limitations, and no language is contained in the alleged letter or publication from which injury or damage to the plaintiff can be inferred. The demurrer was sustained, and, the plaintiff electing to stand on the ruling, judgment was entered against him for costs, and he appeals.

Messrs. J. H. Crosby, H. Rickel, and John T. Christie, for appellant:

A libel is the malicious defamation of a person made public by any printing, writing, sign, picture, representation, or effigy, tending to provoke him to wrath, or expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or to deprive him of the benefits of public confidence and social intercourse.

Words which produce any perceptible injury to the reputation of another are called defamatory, and defamatory words if false are actionable.

Odgers, Libel & Slander, pp. 1, 18.

By defamation is understood a false publication, calculated to bring one into disrepute. Cooley, Torts, p. 193.

The mere written accusation of something assumed to be morally dishonest while it accords with the law is not libelous; as that the person, in answer to a suit, set up the statute of limitations, or the prohibitory liquor law.

To sustain an action for libel the plaintiff must either show special damage, or the nature of the charge must be such that the court can legally presume he has been degraded in the estimation of his acquaintances or of the public, or has suffered some other loss either in property, character, or business, or in his domestic or social relations, in consequence of the publication.

Townshend, Slander & Libel, § 176, p. 204; Cooper v. Stone, 2 Denio, 209.

It is not libelous to charge one with setting up the statute of limitations as a defense in a lawsuit.

No publication is shown. It is not enough that the alleged libel was composed to injure or defame the plaintiff, nor that it was maliciously composed. It must be distinctly averred that the publication itself was malicious, or the complaint will be insufficient.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Conceding the letter to have been published, was it libelous? Our statute defines "libel" to be "the malicious defamation of a person made public by any printing, writing, sign, picture, representation, or effigy tending to provoke him to wrath or expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or to deprive him of the benefits of public confidence and social intercourse." Code 1878, § 4097. "Defamation" is denied by Webster as "the taking from another's reputation." Odgers, in his work on Libel and Slander, p. 1, says: "Words which produce any perceptible injury to the reputation of another are called defamatory." It is "a false publication calculated to bring one in disrepute." Cooley, Torts, p. 198. The derivation of the word leaves no doubt as to its meaning. Was there anything in the letter injurious to the good name of the plaintiff, or tending to bring him into disrepute? It is not dishonorable to be indebted to another, nor is it libelous to publish of another that he owes money. Reg. v. Coghlan, 4 Fost. & F. 316. To be in debt is very common, and to be unable to make payment does not necessarily involve moral turpitude. Nor is the debtor's reputation brought in question by making a defense which the law sanctions and which rests on sound reason and long experience. Formerly, pleading the statute of limitations was looked upon with disfavor. Lord Mansfield remarked in Quantock v. England, 5 Burr. 2630, that, "in honesty, he [a defendant] ought not to defend himself by such a plea." The statute is now generally conceded to be beneficial, and the defense as legitimate as any other. As said by Justice Story in Spring v. Gray, 5 Mason, 523: "The defense, therefore, which it puts forth, is an honorable defense, which does not seek to avoid the payment of just claims and demands, admitted now to be due, but which encounters, in the only practical manner, such as are ancient and unacknowledged; and, whatever may have been their original validity, such as are now beyond the power of the party to meet, with all the proper vouchers and evidence to repel them. The natural presumption certainly is that claims which have been long neglected are unfounded, or, at least, are no longer subsisting demands. And this presumption the statute has erected into a positive bar. There is wisdom and policy in it, as it quickens the diligence of creditors and guards innocent persons from being betrayed by their ignorance, or their overconfidence in regard to transactions which have become dimmed by age." See 3 Parsons, Contr. 61; Penley v. Waterhouse, 3 Iowa, 418. It cannot be libelous to accuse one of doing what the law approves. In Homer v. Engelhardt, 117 Mass. 589, it is held that to accuse one of availing himself of the prohibitory liquor law, in order to defeat an indebtedness for liquor sold, is not libelous, the court remarking that, "the plaintiff having the right to make this defense, it is not libelous to publish the statement that he had done so." Bennett v. Williamson, 4 Sandf. 60, is precisely in point. Since the law recognizes this defense as legitimate and honorable, to accuse one of making it would not amount to defamation. Bishop, Non-Cont. L. § 288.

2. The entire letter must be considered, and therefrom the plain import and natural meaning as intended, and the sense in which it was understood determined. The alleged facts are clearly stated. There is no mistaking them from the opinions expressed by the writers of the letter. The characterization of the acts is based entirely on the assumption that the conduct of plaintiff in availing himself of the defense was not honest and in accord with their standard of integrity. The spirit and purpose of the letter may well be said to indicate an element of character quite as inconsistent with the golden rule as that which permits omissions in the matter of pecuniary obligations. Such a letter may be the subject of just criticism, but its publication does not expose to public hatred or contempt in the sense or to the degree required by the law of libel. See Urban v. Helmick, 15 Wash. 155; Donaghue v. Gaffy, 54 Conn. 257.

- VI. Summary.

I. Beyond a reasonable doubt.

Some of the earlier cases seem to have based the measure of proof of insanity as a defense in criminal cases upon the measure of proof of guilt.

Within this rule it was held that the proof of insanity in a criminal prosecution at the time of committing the act ought to be as clear and satisfactory in order to acquit the accused on the ground of insanity as the proof of committing the act ought to be in order to find a sane man guilty. State v. Spencer, 21 N. J. L. 197.

And the jury in a criminal prosecution must be fully satisfied that the defense of insanity is made out beyond the reasonable doubt of a well-ordered mind. State v. Marier, 2 Ala. 43, 36 Am. Dec. 398, Collier, Ch. J., dissenting and expressing the opinion that insanity must be established by a preponderance of proof; Danforth v. State, 75 Ga. 614, 58 Am. Rep. 490; People v. McCann, 3 Park. Crim. Rep. 272, Reversed in 16 N. Y. 53, 69 Am. Dec. 642; State v. Johnson, Cited in 88 N. C. 611.

It is incumbent upon the state in a criminal prosecution to make out the prisoner's guilt beyond all reasonable doubt, and where the act is incontestably proved, and insanity is relied upon as an excuse, the case is reversed, and the prisoner is bound to make out by testimony beyond all reasonable doubt that he was insane at the time. State v. Brinyea, 5 Ala. 241; Sellick's Case, 1 N. Y. City Hall Rec. 186; State v. Johnson, 40 Conn. 186.

And where it is admitted, or clearly proved, that the accused in a criminal prosecution committed the act, but it was insisted that he was insane at the time, and the evidence leaves the question of insanity in doubt, the presumption of sanity turns the scale, and the prisoner should be held responsible. State v. Spencer, 21 N. J. L. 197; Sellick's Case, 1 N. Y. City Hall Rec. 185.

So, an allegation of insanity as a defense in a prosecution for murder admits the act of killing, and is to be proved by the accused to the satisfaction of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt. State v. West, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 371.

Insanity interposed as a defense in a criminal prosecution must be proved as any other fact to the satisfaction of the jury, and if the proof of insanity does not arise out of the evidence offered by the state, the accused must establish the fact of insanity by distinct evidence, and prove it beyond a reasonable doubt, otherwise the presumption of evidence, but should be held to no higher degree of proof.

2. The proof should be deemed to preponderate in favor of this, as of any other, disputed fact, whenever its existence is made probable upon a full and fair consideration of all the evidence adduced for and against it.

3. An instruction given to the jury in such case, to the effect that the evidence introduced to establish insanity is not "sufficient" if it merely show it to have been probable. The sanity remains unrebutted. State v. Pratt, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 249.

As will be seen by reference to the subsequent sections of this note, however, all the preceding cases must be regarded as overruled.

In Louisiana, however, the rule requiring proof of insanity beyond a reasonable doubt appears to have been retained, at least until a recent date.

Thus, a special plea of temporary insanity as a defense in a criminal prosecution must be proved by the prosecution beyond a reasonable doubt. State v. DeRance, 84 La. Ann. 186, 44 Am. Rep. 428.

And where insanity is set up in a criminal action in avoidance of a penalty prescribed by law, the burden of proving it rests with the accused, and he must make out his case by proof which satisfies the minds of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that he was insane at the time of the commission of the act. State v. Clements, 47 La. Ann. 1088; State v. Coleman, 27 La. Ann. 691; State v. Burns, 25 La. Ann. 302.

In State v. Scott, 49 La. Ann. 252, 86 L. R. A. 721, however, the court refused to follow the previous Louisiana decisions on the subject, and held that insanity must be established to the satisfaction of the jury by clear and convincing proof, and that they should consider all the testimony before them, whether produced by the accused or the state, and give due weight to the presumption of sanity; if, on the whole testimony, and giving to such presumption its full operation, they are satisfied that the accused was insane when the act was committed, they should acquit, but if not thus satisfied they should deem him sane and responsible.

So, where insanity is interposed as a defense in a prosecution for crime the accused is required, under Hill's (Or.) Code 1338, to establish the fact beyond a reasonable doubt. State v. Hansen, 25 Or. 391.

And the finding of a jury in a criminal prosecution, in which insanity is interposed as a defense on the question of sanity, cannot, under that statute, be disturbed on appeal. State v. Hansen, 25 Or. 391.

But insanity, to operate as a defense in a criminal prosecution, must consist of a diseased state of the mind which is so excessive as to overwhelm the reason, conscience, and judgment, and must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. State v. Murray, 11 Or. 418.

II. To the satisfaction of the jury.

By many of the cases the plea of insanity in a prosecution for crime is regarded as one of confession and avoidance. State v. Lewis, 136 Mo. 84; State v. Wright, 134 Mo. 404.

Which must be established by the accused to the satisfaction of the jury. People v. McDonell, 47 Cal. 184; State v. Danby, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 166; State v. Harrigan, 9 *Houst. proof must be such as to overcome the legal presumption of sanity; it must satisfy you he is insane,"—requires of the defendant more than a preponderance of the evidence to maintain this defense, and is therefore erroneous.

The jury must be satisfied from all the evidence, not only of the doing of the act which constitutes the crime, but that it proceeded from a responsible agent capable of committing the offense. Com. v. Heath, 11 Gray, 303.

And the question for the jury is not whether the person was of sound mind, but whether he had made out to their satisfaction that he was not of sound mind. Reg. v. Layton, 4 Cox, C. C. 149; M'Naghten's Case, 10 Clark & F. 200.

And he must prove to the satisfaction of the jury that he was in such a state of mental weakness or disease that he did not know the nature or quality of his act, and that it was wrong. State v. Payne, 86 N. C. 609; Rex v. Offord, 5 Car. & P. 168; Reg. v. Higginson, 4 Car. & K. 129; Reg. v. Townley, 3 Fost. & F. 839.

He must clear himself by satisfying the jury that he was incapable of perceiving the criminality of the act. People v. Pine, 2 Barb. 566.

And it is not medical, but legal, insanity which is required to be proved to the satisfaction of the jury, to excuse from criminal responsibility. Leache v. State, 22 Tex. App. 279, 58 Am. Rep. 638, 39 L. R. A.

judgment of the Court of Common Pleas convicting defendant of murder. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Foran & Dawley for plaintiff in error.

Mr. F. L. Strimple for the State.

Bradbury, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error, Bushrod Kelch, in December, 1895, was indicted in the county of

The presumption of sanity will of itself sustain the burden of proof resting upon the state in a criminal case so far as the issue of sanity is involved, until it is rebutted and overcome by satisfactory evidence to the contrary. King v. State, 9 Tex. App. 515; Kriel v. Com. 5 Bush, 363.

Insanity is an unusual, unnatural, and exceptional condition, and its existence should not be found except upon proof of a reliable character which satisfies the mind of the jury. State v. Geddis, 42 Iowa, 268.

And the evidence must be satisfactory, not merely doubtful. Ortwein v. Com. 76 Pa. 414, 18 Am. Rep. 420.

It must satisfy the minds and consciences of the jury. Johnson v. State, 10 Tex. App. 571.

Where the claim of insanity set up as a defense in a criminal action is unusual, unnatural, and out of the ordinary course of affairs, the jury is not required to take the same for granted upon slight evidence, and should not find its existence except on evidence of a reliable character which satisfies them that the defense has been made out. State v. Hockett, 70 Iowa, 442.

And a mere reasonable doubt upon the part of the jury as to the sanity of the accused in a criminal prosecution does not entitle him to an acquittal. State v. Erb, 74 Mo. 199; State v. Johnson, 91 Mo. 439; State v. McCoy, 34 Mo. 531, 86 Am. Dec. 121; State v. Huting, 21 Mo. 464; Baldwin v. State, 12 Mo. 223; State v. Hanley, 34 Minn. 420; Bonfanti v. State, 2 Minn. 122; Lynch v. Com. 77 Pa. 205; Ortwein v. Com. 76 Pa. 414, 18 Am. Rep. 420; Com. v. Lynch, 3 Pittsb. 412; Baccigalupo v. Com. 38 Gratt. 807, 36 Am. Rep. 795; Boswell v. Com. 20 Gratt. 800; Dejarrette v. Com. 75 Va. 867; State v. Douglass, 20 W. Va. 297; State v. Strauder, 11 W. Va. 745, 27 Am. Rep. 606; People v. Barthleman (Cal.) 52 Pac. 112.

So, a jury cannot find the fact of insanity specially under Pa. Crim. Code March, 1880, § 66, requiring them upon acquitting a person accused of crime, to find specially whether he was insane at the time of the commission of the offense, and to declare whether the acquittal was on the ground of insanity, unless they are satisfied of it by the evidence, a reasonable doubt of the fact of insanity not being a true basis of the finding. Ortwein v. Com. 76 Pa. 414, 18 Am. Rep. 420.

But in passing upon the question they are to look to the whole evidence in the case, as well that for the state as for the prisoner. State v. Strauder, 11 W. Va. 745, 27 Am. Rep. 606; Com. v. Heath, 11 Gray, 303; Com. v. Rogers, 7 Met. 500, 41 Am. Dec. 458; Kriel v. Com. 5 Bush, 363.

And a person accused of crime is not to be acquitted upon the ground of insanity unless upon the whole evidence the jury are satisfied that he was insane at the time. United States v. McGlue, 1 Curt. C. C. 1.

Insanity is a simple question of fact to be proved like any other fact, however, and any evidence which reasonably satisfies the jury that the accused was insane at the time of the commission of the act is sufficient. State v. Hundley, 46 Mo. 414; State v. Pagels, 92 Mo. 300; State v. Smith, 53 Mo. 287; State v. Bruce, 43 Iowa, 530, 30 Am. Rep. 403.

Cuyaboga for murder in the first degree for killing a woman who had been his wife, but who, shortly before the homicide, had procured a divorce from him. In February, 1896, he was placed on trial in the court of common pleas in said county for such offense, and in March following was convicted of murder in the first degree, and adjudged to suffer death. Upon proceeding in error, this judgment was affirmed by the circuit court, whereupon the cause was brought to this court for review.

Positive and direct proof of insanity is not necessary. State v. Pagels, 92 Mo. 300.

It is the duty of the jury in a prosecution for homicide to acquit where insanity is proved by the evidence to their reasonable satisfaction. State v. Wright, 184 Mo. 404.

And if upon the whole evidence they believe he was insane when he committed the act they should acquit. Dejarnette v. Com. 75 Va. 867; Boswell v. Com. 20 Gratt. 660; State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 713, 43 Am. Rep. 799.

Insanity interposed as a defense in a prosecution for homicide need not be established by the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt. State v. Wright, 184 Mo. 404; Gunter v. State, 83 Ala. 96; Ford v. State, 71 Ala. 385; Boswell v. State, 63 Ala. 307, 35 Am. Rep. 20; Danforth v. State, 75 Ga. 614; State v. Bruce, 48 Iowa, 533, 30 Am. Rep. 403; State v. Felter, 32 Iowa, 53; Kriel v. Com. 5 Bush, 363; State v. Duestrow, 137 Mo. 44; State v. Hundley, 46 Mo. 414; Genz v. State, 58 N. J. L. 482; State v. Davis, 109 N. C. 780; State v. Potts, 100 N. C. 457; Pannell v. Com. 86 Pa. 200; Williams v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 39 S. W. 687; Burt v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 39 L. R. A. 305; Boswell v. Com. 20 Gratt. 660; State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 713, 43 Am. Rep. 799; Dove v. State, 3 Heisk. 348.

So, mania a potu is the secondary effect of intemperance and a species of insanity, and a defense in a criminal prosecution when proved to the satisfaction of the jury. State v. Hurley, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 23.

And an instruction in a prosecution for homicide that a man is presumed to be sane until the contrary is shown to the satisfaction of the jury, accompanied by a subsequent statement that the burden of proof of insanity rests with the defendant, is not objectionable as making the presumption of sanity and the burden of proof of insanity too prominent. Massengale v. State, 24 Tex. App. 181.

III. A preponderance of the evidence.

a. General rules.

A large number of the cases regard insanity as an independent and affirmative defense in a criminal prosecution. Com. v. Bezek, 183 Pa. 603; State v. Lewis, 20 Nev. 333.

And hold with the principal case, that a person accused of crime who interposes insanity as a defense must prove it by a preponderance of the evidence. Ford v. State, 71 Ala. 385; Boswell v. State, 63 Ala. 307, 35 Am. Rep. 20; Parsons v. State, 81 Ala. 577, 60 Am. Rep. 138; Gunter v. State, 83 Ala. 96; Maxwell v. State, 89 Ala. 150; Coates v. State, 50 Ark. 330; Williams v. That the plaintiff in error shot and killed the deceased was not denied or contested upon the trial; the chief contention being over the mental condition of the accused at the time the homicide was committed. Counsel for him contended: First, that the evidence of the state did not sufficiently establish deliberation or premeditation; and, second, that his evidence was sufficient to show insanity, superinduced by the excessive use of alcoholic stimulants. The question of the burden of proof, Lewis, 20 Nev. 333; People v. Dillon, 8 Utah, 92.

And that the accused must establish by a preponderance of proof, not only the fact of insanity, but insanity of such a character as will amount in law to a defense. People v. Bell, 49 Cal. 485.

Within this rule one who relies upon insanity as a defense for the commission of a criminal act must prove by a preponderance of evidence that at the time of the commission of the crime his mind was so far affected with insanity as to render him incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong with respect to the act with which he is charged, or, if he were conscious and knew its consequences, that in consequence of his insanity he was wrought up to a frenzy which rendered him unable to control his actions or direct his movements. Williams v. State, 50 Ark. 517.

The presumption of law that all men are of sound mind sustains the burden of proof resting upon the prosecution in a criminal action until rebutted and overcome by a preponderance of the whole evidence. Com. v. Eddy, 7 Gray, 583; State v. Lewis, 20 Nev. 333.

And the rule requiring proof of the commission of a criminal act beyond a reasonable doubt does not apply to questions of insanity; on that question it is for him who alleges it to prove it in the same manner as other material allegations are proved. State v. Starling, 51 N. C. (6 Jones, L.) 266; People v. Ward, 105 Cal. 335; State v. Hurley, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 23.

Where the person accused of crime relies upon any substantive, distinct, separate, and independent matter as a defense which is outside of and does not necessarily constitute a part of the act or transaction with which he is charged, such as the defense of insanity, it devolves upon him to establish such special and foreign matter by a preponderance of the evidence. Leache v. State, 22 Tex. App. 279, 58 Am. Rep. 638; Jones v. State, 13 Tex. App. 1.

And it is not sufficient to merely raise a reasonable doubt as to his sanity. State v. Bell, 136 Mo. 120; State v. Lewis, 20 Nev. 333; Graves v. State, 45 N. J. L. 347, 46 Am. Rep. 773.

A reasonable doubt as to the prisoner's sanity, raised by all the evidence, does not authorize an acquittal. Parsons v. State, 81 Ala. 577, 60 Am. Rep. 138; Maxwell v. State, 89 Ala. 150; Ford v.

where insanity is set up as a defense in criminal causes, has been fruitful of discussion, and has occupied the attention of the ablest criminal jurists of this country and of England. The contention has not so much concerned the degree of proof as upon whom the burden rested. Some authorities entitled to great consideration have steadily held that this burden rested upon the state; that, while the presumption of sanity was sufficient to support this burden where the evidence did not suggest mental alienation, yet, if the defense was made, the state was bound to establish sanity beyond a reasonable doubt. This view was founded upon the obligation which rests upon the state to establish beyond a reasonable doubt every fact necessary to create in the defendant criminal liability. Criminal intent being one of such facts, it was included within the general obligation above stated; and to establish this criminal intent a mental condition capable of entertaining it must be established. This course of reasoning would render immaterial the question whether the doubt of sanity arose upon the evidence of the state, or of the defendant, or upon that of both the state and the de-

State, 71 Ala. 385; Boswell v. State, 63 Ala. 307, 36 Am. Rep. 20; People v. Myers, 20 Cal. 518; People v. Barthleman (Cal.) 52 Pac. 112; People v. Bawden, 90 Cal. 195; Kriel v. Com. 5 Bush, 363; State v. Starling, 51 N. C. (6 Jones, L.) 366.

And this is the rule whether the reasonable doubt arises as to the fact of insanity or as to the actual connection between it and the criminal act. Gunter v. State, 59 Ala. 98.

And evidence tending to rebut the presumption of sanity in a criminal prosecution sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt upon the issue of sanity does not shift the burden of proof to the state to show beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused was sane at the time the alleged offense was committed. Cavanaugh v. State, 43 Ark. 331.

And refusal to instruct that if the evidence points to two conclusions, one consistent with the defendant's guilt and the other consistent with his innocence, the jury is bound to adopt the one of innocence and acquit him, is not error where the only defense is insanity. People v. Barthleman (Cal.) 52 Pac. 112.

And an instruction that if one set or chain of circumstances leads to two opposing conclusions, one pointing to guilt and the other to innocence, and the jury have any reasonable doubt as to which of such conclusions the chain of circumstances leads to, a reasonable doubt is thereby created and the defendant must be acquitted, is erroneous where the sole defense is insanity, as a reasonable doubt as to insanity is not sufficient to make out that defense, and the expression of a doubt about two opposing conclusions, to both of which a chain leads, is confusing. People v. Barthleman (Cal.) 52 Pac. 112.

After the state has made out her case in a prosecution for crime with the legal presumption of sanity on her behalf, however, it can be overcome by a preponderance of the evidence in the prisoner's behalf. Kriel v. Com. 5 Bush, 363.

And a conviction for murder by a grandmother of her three-year-old grandson will be set aside on appeal where the great preponderance of the testimony clearly shows insanity to have existed at the time. Newberry v. State, 22 Tex. Crim. Rep. 145.

So the evidence to overcome the presumption of sanity and responsibility in a criminal case may come as well from the witnesses for the government as from the witnesses for the defense. Com. v. Heath, 11 Gray, 308.

And the presumption of sanity in a criminal prosecution is overcome, and the burden of proof of insanity resting with the defendant, is satisfied by a mere preponderance of the evidence. State v. Larkins (Idaho) 47 Pac. 945; People v. Messersmith, 57 Cal. 573; State v. Jones, 64 Iowa, 356; Phelps v. Com. 17 Ky. L. Rep. 706; Ball v. Com. 81 Ky. 662; Com. v. Rogers, 7 Met. 500, 41 Am. Dec. 456; State v. Wright, 134 Mo. 404; State v. Williamson, 106 Mo. 162; State v. Hundley, 46 Mo. 414; State v. Klinger, 43 Mo. 127; State v. McCoy, 34 Mo. 531, 86 Am. Dec. 121; Cottell v. State, 12 Ohio C. C. 467; Bond v. State, 23 Ohio St. 349; Loeffner v. State, 10 89 L. R. A.

Ohio St. 590; Sharkey v. State, 4 Ohio C. C. 101; Pannell v. Com. 86 Pa. 260; Meyers v. Com. 88 Pa. 131; State v. Alexander, 30 S. C. 74.

Where a preponderance of the testimony shows the insanity of the accused in a criminal prosecution it raises a reasonable doubt of guilt. State v. Bruce, 48 Iowa, 533, 30 Am. Rep. 408.

And the accused is entitled to an acquittal if from the evidence it seems probable that he was insane. State v. Jones, 64 Iowa, 356. But see Sharkey v. State, 4 Ohio C. C. 101, infra, II.

Insanity is not required to be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Coffman, 24 Cal. 230; People v. Wilson, 49 Cal. 13; State v. Larkins (Idaho) 47 Pac. 945; Danforth v. State, 75 Ga. 614, 58 Am. Rep. 480; Ball v. Com. 81 Ky. 662; State v. Wright, 134 Mo. 404; State v. Hundley, 46 Mo. 414; State v. Klinger, 43 Mo. 127; Graves v. State, 45 N. J. L. 203; Cottell v. State, 12 Ohio C. C. 467; Loeffner v. State, 10 Ohio St. 590; Pannell v. Com. 86 Pa. 260; Meyers v. Com. 88 Pa. 141; Com. v. Werling, 164 Pa. 559; State v. Alexander, 30 S. C. 74.

Though, unless there is a preponderance of evidence in favor of the insanity of the defendant in a criminal action, the jury will not be authorized to acquit him of the offense charged on that ground. Carter v. State, 56 Ga. 463; Danforth v. State, 75 Ga. 614, 58 Am. Rep. 480.

So, the burden of proof in an inquiry as to the present sanity or insanity of a person accused of crime rests with him to show by a preponderance of the proof that he is insane. State v. O'Grady, 3 Ohio Legal News, 137.

b. What constitutes a sufficient preponderance.

The preponderance of proof required to establish insanity in a criminal action is one which can be perceived upon a fair consideration of the evidence. State v. Grear, 29 Minn. 221; Meyers v. Com. 88 Pa. 141.

It is not a preponderance in point of number of witnesses, but a preponderance of facts and circumstances, which are convincing to the minds of the jury. People v. Barberi, 47 N. Y. Supp. 163.

It consists of the greater weight of credible evidence in the case. State v. Trout, 74 Iowa, 545. And see principal case.

And before a recovery can be had in an action to set aside a contract because of the incapacity of one of the parties thereto the plaintiff's evidence must outweigh that of the defendant, and an instruction to find for the defendant if the evidence is equiponderant is not erroneous. Wall v. Hill, 1 B. Mon. 290, 36 Am. Dec. 578.

As the accused in a criminal prosecution is presumed to be sane, there must be sufficient evidence to overturn such presumption, to operate as a defense. Moore v. Com. 92 Ky. 630.

The evidence of insanity must outweigh and overcome the presumption of sanity, and the evidence in favor of sanity, in some appreciable degree. State v. Lewis, 20 Nev. 383.

Sufficient proof must be shown to overcome, in the first place, the presumption of sanity, and then any other proof that may be offered by a pre-pendant; the doubt, however arising, being available by the defendant. This view of the question finds support in numerous well-considered cases, among which may be cited: Hoppe v. People, 81 Ill. 385, 88 Am. Dec. 281; Chase v. People, 40 Ill. 852; State v. Crawford, 11 Kan. 82; People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 97 Am. Dec. 162; Cunningham v. State, 56 Miss. 269, 31 Am. Rep. 860; Bradley v. State, 31 Ind. 492; McDougal v. State, 88 Ind. 24; Guetig v. State, 66 Ind. 94, 32 Am. Rep. 99; Wright v. People, 4 Neb. 407; Ballard v. State, 19 Neb. 609; *State v. Am. Rep. 538; State v. Bartlett, 48 N. H. 224, 80 Am. Dec. 154; State v. Jones, 50 N. H. 369, 9 Am. Rep. 242; People v. McCann, 16 N. Y. 58, 69 Am. Dec. 642; O'Connell v. People, 87 N. Y. 377, 41 Am. Rep. 379; Dove v. State, 8 Heisk. 848; State v. Patterson, 45 Vt. 808, 12 Am. Rep. 200.

The logical consistency of this view of the question is its chief support. In the practical administration of criminal law, however, experience has found much to commend in that opposite view which treats the defense of insanity as independent and affirmative, and ponderance of evidence. State v. Bundy, 24 S. C. 499, 58 Am. Rep. 263.

The legal presumption is in favor of sanity, and one who does not deny the commission of the criminal act, but pleads insanity as an excuse, takes the burden of proof, and if he fails to produce evidence to change the presumption raised against him by the fact of the killing, the penalty of the law should be adjudged against him. McKenzie v. State, 26 Ark. 334.

To establish insanity as a defense in a criminal prosecution, it must be proved affirmatively that the accused was insane, and if it be left in doubt, and the crime charged be proved, it is the duty of the jury to convict. Reg. v. Stokes, 8 Car. & K. 185.

And the court, in a prosecution for homicide in which insanity is interposed as a defense, will not assume that the testimony of the defense showing epilepsy is not contradicted, and instruct the jury that this fact of itself should be sufficient to raise a doubt as to the prisoner's criminal responsibility. where, from the evidence, it was contended that he had not been afflicted with epileptic attacks for months, perhaps years, before the crime, and that the light character of the disease had but little, if any, effect on his mental condition. Com. v. Bucieri, 153 Pa. 585.

It is sufficient to establish insanity as a defense to crime, however, if the evidence be such as would justify a jury in a civil case in finding a defendant insane if the single issue sane or insane were submitted to them. People v. Hamilton, 62 Cal. 377; People v. Messersmith, 61 Cal. 246; People v. Wilson, 49 Cal. 13; People v. McDowell, 47 Cal. 134; People v. Coffman, 24 Cal. 230; Com. v. Gerade, 145 Pa. 289.

It is for him who alleges insanity to prove it as other material allegations are proved. State v. Starling, 51 N. C. (6 Jones, L.) 366.

And it has been held that a bare preponderance of testimony is all that is necessary to rebut the presumption of sanity in a prosecution for crime. Bond v. State, 23 Ohio St. 349.

But a mere probability of insanity is not sufficient. Sharkey v. State, 4 Ohio C. C. 101.

And some of the cases have qualified the rule by requiring fairly preponderating evidence of insanity. Com. v. Bezek, 168 Pa. 608; Coyle v. Com. 100 Pa. 573, 45 Am. Rep. 397; Pannell v. Com. 86 Pa. 260.

And a satisfactory preponderance has been required. State v. Felter, 32 Iowa, 53.

And also a clear preponderance. State v. Martin, 4 N. J. L. J. 252, 3 Crim. L. Mag. 44; Graves v. State, 45 N. J. L. 203; Farrer v. State, 2 Ohio St. 70.

So, some of the cases have held that insanity must be established to the satisfaction of the jury by a preponderance of proof. Gunter v. State, 83 Ala. 96; Ford v. State, 71 Ala. 385; Boswell v. State, 63 Ala. 307, 35 Am. Rep. 20; People v. Messersmith, 57 Cal. 575; State v. Lewis, 20 Nev. 833; Com. v. Eddy, 7 Gray, 533; State v. Burns, 25 La. Ann. 302; Coyle v. Com. 100 Pa. 573, 45 Am. Rep. 397.

And by the weight and preponderance of the evidence. State v. Smith, 53 Mo. 267.

And that it is sufficient if the jury is reasonably satisfied by the weight or preponderance of the testimony. State v. Wright, 134 Mo. 404; State v. Hundley, 46 Mo. 414; State v. Klinger, 48 Mo. 127; Loeffner v. State, 10 Ohio St. 598; Cottell v. State, 12 Ohio C. C. 469.

Or if the proof of insanity preponderates and satisfies the jury. State v. Williamson, 106 Mo. 162; Pannell v. Com. 86 Pa. 260.

And a number of Pennsylvania cases have held that mental incapacity in a criminal prosecution is to be established by the weight of the evidence. Com. v. Woodley, 166 Pa. 463; Com. v. Wering, 164 Pa. 559.

And that a person accused of crime is entitled to the benefit of a reasonable doubt as to his guilt, and such reasonable doubt never shifts; but where he sets up a substantive defense admitting indirectly the commission of the act charged against him, he is required to establish that defense by the weight of evidence. Com. v. Gentry, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 708.

And that an instruction in a criminal prosecution that the accused should be held responsible for his acts until the fact is positively proved that he is not responsible is objectionable as requiring too high a measure of proof, but is not reversible error where it is followed by a statement that the jury should be satisfied,—not clearly, but by the weight of the evidence simply, because the accused is not bound to prove irresponsibility except by the weight of evidence,—a fair preponderance of evidence. Com. v. Woodley, 166 Pa. 463.

But, upon the other hand, it has been held that an instruction in a prosecution for crime requiring proof of insanity by clear, preponderating evidence, instead of fairly preponderating evidence, is reversible error. Coyle v. Com. 100 Pa. 573, 45 Am. Rep. 397.

And that an instruction in a prosecution for homicide that insanity must be clearly proved, is objectionable as imposing too great a burden upon the defendant; it need only be proved by fairly preponderating evidence such as is ordinarily required to prove a fact in civil issues. Com. v. Gerade, 145 Pa. 289.

And that error in instructing that insanity must be clearly proved is not remedied by a subsequent instruction that it must be proved by a preponderance of the evidence, as it cannot be determined which of the two measures the jury adopted. Com. v. Gerade, 145 Pa. 289.

And that an instruction in a criminal action that insanity as a defense should be shown to the satisfaction of the jury by a clear preponderance of the testimony is objectionable in the use of the word "clear" as tending to lead the jury to believe that something more than a preponderance or what would reasonably satisfy them was necessary. State v. Hundley, 46 Mo. 414.

An instruction in a criminal prosecution that insanity as a defense must be clearly proved, however, has been held not to be error, as a preponderance of the evidence is sufficient to constitute clear proof. Smith v. State, 19 Tex. App. 95.

And an instruction that insanity must be clearly which, consequently, casts upon the accused who asserts it the burden of sustaining it by evidence sufficient to overcome the natural presumption of sanity. Among the cases that sustain this side of the contention may be cited: State v. Jones, 84 Iowa, 349; Ford v. State, 71 Ala. 885; State v. Lawrence, 57 Me. 574; Com. v. Eddy, 7 Gray, 588; McKenzie v. State, 26 Ark. 834; Cavaness v. State, 43 Ark. 831; People v. Bell, 49 Cal. 485; Dejarnette v. Com. 75 Va. 867; Webb v. State, 9 Tex. App. 490; King v. State, 9 Tex. App. 515; Coyle v. Com. 100 Pa. 578, 45 Am. Rep. 397; Lynch v. Com. 77

Pa. 205; State v. Redemeier, 71 Mo. 178, 86 Am. Rep. 462; State v. Gut, 13 Minn. 841 (Gil. 315); State v. McCoy, 84 Mo. 581, 86 Am. Dec. 121. This doctrine has prevailed in Ohio from an early period in its judicial annals. Clark v. State, 12 Ohio, 483; Bond v. State, 23 Ohio St. 849; Bergin v. State, 81 Ohio St. 111; Loeffner v. State, 10 Ohio St. 598.

This being the established doctrine of this state the burden of proving his insanity rested on the plaintiff in error. If this burden should be sustained, the law exonerates him from criminal responsibility for his act. It is apparent, there established is not objectionable as requiring that the evidence must more than predominate, as it only requires that the preponderance must be plainly apparent. People v. Hamilton, 62 Cal. 377, Overruling People v. Wreden, 50 Cal. 362.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution that insanity must be shown by the weight and preponderance of the testimony is a mere informality, and not a ground for reversal, though the jurors might be led to believe therefrom that it takes something more than a conviction of the mind to find in favor of a plea of insanity. State v. Smith, 53 Mo. 267.

In a large number of the states, however, as will be seen by reference to the cases cited supra, the terms "by a preponderance of the evidence" and "by satisfactory evidence" or "to the satisfaction of the jury" have been used interchangeably and indiscriminately by the court, leading to the inference that they were regarded as meaning the same. This is particularly the case with California, Georgia, Iowa, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, and Texas.

IV. Clearly proved, reasonable certainty, etc.

The rule has been laid down by some cases that the accused in a criminal prosecution who sets up insanity as a defense must clearly prove that at the time of the act he was laboring under such a defect of reason by disease of the mind as not to know the nature of the act he was doing, or if he did know it that he was ignorant that he was doing wrong. Casat v. State, 40 Ark. 511; Newcomb v. State, 37 Miss. 388; State v. Burns, 25 La. Ann. 802; State v. Martin, 4 N. J. L. J. 252, 3 Crim. L. Mag. 44; Webb v. State, 5 Tex. App. 580; Clark v. State, 8 Tex. App. 360; Smith v. State, 19 Tex. App. 95; Com. v. McCaulley, 16 Phila. 502; McNaghten's Case, 10 Clark & F. 200; People v. Klein, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 13, cited in Ray, Med. Jur. 5th ed. § 42.

And that he had not knowledge and capacity enough to form a criminal intent or purpose. People v. Klein, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 13, cited in Ray, Med. Jur. 5th ed. § 42.

Within this rule insanity alleged as a defense must be clearly proved and shown to have existed at the time of the offense. Com. v. Farkin, 2 Clark (Pa.) 208.

And the insanity of a juror in a criminal prosecution alleged as a ground for a new trial must be proved by clear and full evidence. State v. Scott, 8 N. C. (1 Hawks) 24.

And to warrant a verdict of acquittal upon the ground of insanity in a criminal prosecution under Tex. Code Proc. art. 722, providing that when the defendant is acquitted on that ground the jury shall so state in their verdict, the evidence of insanity should be sufficiently clear to convince the minds and conscience of the jury. Webb v. State, 9 Tex. App. 490.

So, it has been held that insanity must be clearly established by satisfactory proof. People v. McDonnell, 47 Cal. 134.

And that it must be made clear to the satisfaction of the jury. Reg. v. Stokes, 3 Car. & K. 185.

And that it must be established to the satisfaction of the jury, and clearly proved. McNaghten's Case, 10 Clark & F. 200.

And that there is nothing wrong in telling the jury that after weighing the evidence they must decide according to their consciences. People v. Hubert (Cal.) 51 Pac. 329.

An instruction in a criminal prosecution that the defendant must establish insanity by a preponderance of evidence instead of to the satisfaction of the jury, however, is not reversible error, as there might be a preponderance of the evidence and still a failure to satisfy the jury. State v. Payne, 86 N. C. 609.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution requiring insanity to be clearly proved to establish a defense is not objectionable as a charge upon the degree or measure and not upon the weight of evidence. Giebel v. State, 28 Tex. App. 151.

So, to support the defense of insanity in a prosecution for murder it has been held that it ought to be proved by the most distinct and unquestionable evidence that the accused was incapable at the time of judging between right and wrong, and that he did not consider that murder was a crime against the laws of God and nature. Bellingham's Case, 1 Collinson on Lunacy, 636.

And the rule has been laid down that it is the duty of the jury in a criminal case to convict unless the evidence rationally convinces them that at the time of the criminal act the accused was laboring under such a state of mental aberration and disease as to deprive him of a knowledge of right and wrong, or, if he knew this, to take from him the moral power to resist his morbid inclination to its perpetration. Kriel v. Com. 5 Bush, 363.

And that insanity may be proved by such facts and circumstances as convince the mind of its existence the same as any other fact, and that it is not necessary that the proof should be direct and positive. State v. Hockett, 70 Iowa, 442.

And it has been held that it should be made to appear to a reasonable certainty that at the time of the commission of the criminal act the accused did not know the nature and quality of the act, or that it was wrong. Humphreys v. State, 45 Ga. 180.

And that to warrant an acquittal on a charge that the accused withdrew his allegiance from the King and served as a soldier against him, the jury must be perfectly satisfied that at the time of the commission of the crime the prisoner did not know right from wrong. Parker's Case, 1 Collinson, Lunacy, 477.

And it has been held that insanity must be established by the accused to the satisfaction of the jury, to a reasonable certainty. Beck v. State, 73 Ga. 452.

An instruction in a criminal action that the jury must be satisfied that the defendant was insane before they can acquit him, however, though perhaps too strongly stated, is not a ground for re-fore, that to him it was of prime importance that an accurate measure of this burden should be given to the jury. If the charge of the court, in this respect, imposed on him a greater burden than the law prescribes, it contained error [prejudicial to this defense].

In most of the cases relating to the burden of proof of insanity in criminal causes the contention was confined to the question of where it rested,—whether on the state or on the defendant,—and the quantum or degree of proof, where made to rest on defendant, received little, if any, consideration, either by counsel or the court; and language was sometimes employed by the court which seemed to require of the defendant, to establish his insanity, more than a preponderance of the evidence. In some of the cases, however, the question of the quantum of proof where the burden was placed on the accused came directly before the court. Among them is the case of Coyle v. Com. 100 Pa. 573, 45 Am. Rep. 397, where it was held that a charge to the jury which required of the defendant "clearly preponderating evidence" instead of "fairly preponderative evidence" of insanity, was error. In Com. v. Rogers, 7 Met.

versal where there is no evidence of the insanity before the jury. Holsenbake v. State, 45 Ga. 43.

"Clearly proved" and "proved beyond a reasonable doubt" are not convertible terms; the latter implies a higher degree of certainty than the former. If the preponderance of testimony is on the side of insanity it is to be regarded as clearly proved, although there is a reasonable doubt of its existence. Farrer v. State, 2 Ohio St. 70.

And it has been said that it would be error to declare that insanity as an affirmative defense must be clearly proved, as a preponderance of evidence meets the legal requirement. People v. Nino, 149 N. Y. 827.

But it is not reversible error to define reasonable doubt as fair doubt. People v. Hubert (Cal.) 51 Pac. 329.

By reference to the cases cited supra, however, it would appear that the courts of some of the states, notably Arkansas, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, and Texas, have used the expressions "clearly proved" and "by a preponderance of evidence" or "to the satisfaction of the jury," interchangeably, and as meaning the same thing.

V. Reasonable doubt of insanity.

a. General rules.

The doctrine adopted by many of the courts, including those of the United States and a number of the leading states, is that sanity is a necessary condition to the commission of a crime. People v. McCann, 16 N. Y. 58, 60 Am. Dec. 642.

And that it is an ingredient in crime as necessary as the overt act itself, without which there can be no crime. Chase v. People, 40 Ill. 363; Hopps v. People, 31 Ill. 385, 83 Am. Dec. 231.

Within this rule, where insanity is relied on as a defense in a prosecution for crime, and evidence is given tending to show it, and a reasonable, well-founded doubt is thereby raised of the sanity of the accused, he is entitled to the benefit of such doubt. State v. Marler, 2 Ala. 43, 38 Am. Dec. 398; State v. Thomas, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 511; Anderson v. State, 42 Ga. 9; Armstrong v. State, 80 Fla. 170, 17 L. R. A. 484; Hodge v. State, 26 Fla. 11; Armstrong v. State, 27 Fla. 366; Chase v. People, 40 Ill. 363; Langdon v. People, 133 Ill. 382; Hopps v. People, 31 Ill. 385, 83 Am. Dec. 231; Gueltig v. State, 66 Ind. 94, 32 Am. Rep. 99; Polk v. State, 19 Ind. 170, 81 Am. Dec. 382; Plake v. State, 121 Ind. 433; Grubb v. State, 117 Ind. 277; Stevens v. State, 31 Ind. 485, 99 Am. Dec. 634; State v. Mahn, 25 Kan. 132; State v. Nixon, 32 Kan. 205; State v. Crawford, 11 Kan. 32; Smith v. Com. 1 Duv. 224; People v. McCann, 16 N. Y. 58, 60 Am. Dec. 642; Wagner v. People, 2 Keyes, 684; State v. Bartlett, 43 N. H. 224, 80 Am. Dec. 154; Farrer v. State, 2 Ohio St. 54; State v. Gardiner, Wright (Ohio) 392; Com. v. Winemore, 1 Brewst. (Pa.) 356; State v. Coleman, 20 S. C. 441; Lawless v. State, 4 Lea, 179; King v. State, 91 Tenn. 617; Dove v. State, 3 Helsk. 348; Revoir v. State, 82 Wis. 296; Davis v. United States, 160 U. S. 469, 40 L. ed. 499.

A reasonable doubt on the part of a jury in a criminal prosecution upon all the evidence as to the capacity of the accused to know that his act was wrong, entitles him to an acquittal. State v. Thomas, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 511; Coffee v. State, 3 Yerg. 238, 24 Am. Dec. 570.

And a prisoner charged with murder is entitled to an acquittal if the jury entertain a reasonable doubt as to his soundness of mind at the time of the homicide, although they believed he had judgment and reason sufficient to discriminate between right and wrong in the ordinary affairs of life. Stevens v. State, 31 Ind. 485, 99 Am. Dec. 634.

In Chase v. People, 40 Ill. 363, supra, Hopps v. People, 31 Ill. 385, 83 Am. Dec. 231, supra, was explained, the court saying that what was decided in that case was that sanity is an ingredient in crime as essential as the overt act, and if sanity is wanting there can be no crime, and if the jury entertain a reasonable doubt on the question of sanity, the prisoner is entitled to the benefit of that doubt.

And in Hopps v. People, 31 Ill. 385, 83 Am. Dec. 231, Fligher v. People, 23 Ill. 296, holding that insanity must be shown by sufficient proof, was overruled.

So, the burden of proof of sanity in a prosecution for murder, where evidence of insanity has been given, rests with the prosecution to establish beyond a reasonable doubt. State v. Johnson, 40 Conn. 133; Stevens v. State, 31 Ind. 485, 99 Am. Dec. 634; Hite v. Sims, 94 Ind. 333; Bradley v. State, 31 Ind. 492; Hiler v. State, 4 Blackf. 552; State v. Reddick, 7 Kan. 143; State v. Crawford, 11 Kan. 32; Russell v. State, 53 Miss. 367; People v. Finley, 38 Mich. 432; Wright v. People, 4 Neb. 407; Furst v. State, 31 Neb. 403; Ballard v. State, 19 Neb. 609; Smith v. State, 4 Neb. 277; State v. Bartlett, 43 N. H. 224, 80 Am. Dec. 154; State v. Jones, 50 N. H. 399, 9 Am. Rep. 242; State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 399, 6 Am. Rep. 533; Moett v. People, 85 N. Y. 373; People v. Nino, 149 N. Y. 818; Walker v. People, 88 N. Y. 81; O'Brien v. People, 48 Barb. 274; Davis v. United States, 160 U. S. 469, 40 L. ed. 499.

The defendant is to be acquitted unless the jury are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the killing was not produced by mental disease. State v. Jones, 50 N. H. 399, 9 Am. Rep. 242; Wright v. People, 4 Neb. 407; Ballard v. State, 19 Neb. 609.

And the prosecution in a criminal action must satisfy the jury beyond all reasonable doubt that at the moment the criminal act was committed the accused had sufficient reason to understand and form and have a criminal intent, and to distinguish between right and wrong. Moett v. People, 85 N. Y. 373.

And that the accused possessed sufficient mental capacity to comprehend the nature of the act complained of. State v. State, 31 Neb. 403; Russell v. State, 53 Miss. 367.

Sanity is presumed, and the prosecutor in a criminal case may rest upon such presumption without other proof; but upon the general question whether the crime if committed was committed by a person responsible for his acts, the presumption of sanity and the evidence are both to be considered, the affirmative resting with the prosecution, and if a reasonable doubt exists as to whether the person

500, 41 Am. Dec. 458, in trial for murder, Shaw, Ch. J., presiding, the jury, after receiving the charge of the court, and consulting several hours, came into court for instructions respecting the degree of proof requisite to establish insanity, and were instructed that, "if the preponderance of the evidence was in favor of insanity of the prisoner, the jury would be authorized to find him insane." In Bowell v. State, the supreme court of Alabama laid down the rule as follows: "We hold, then, that insanity is a defense which must be proved to the satisfaction of the jury, by that measure of proof which is required in civil causes." 68 Ala. 826, 35 Am. Rep. 20. In State v. Jones, 64 Iowa, 550, the charge was murder in the first degree. The supreme court held that "where one charged with murder relies upon his insanity as a defense, the burden is on him to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that at the time of the killing he was in such a state of insanity as not to be accountable for the act; but an instruction that, 'if the evidence goes no farther than to show that such a state of mind was merely probable, it was not sufficient,' was erroneous, because its effect was to is sane or not he is entitled to the benefit of the doubt and to an acquittal. Dacey v. People, 116 Ill. 535; Montag v. People, 141 Ill. 75; Bradley v. State, 31 Ind. 492; People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 97 Am. Dec. 162; Cunningham v. State, 56 Miss. 269, 31 Am. Rep. 360; Ford v. State, 73 Miss. 734, 35 L. R. A. 117; Brotherton v. People, 75 N. Y. 159; Walker v. People, 1 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 7; People v. Coleman, 1 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 1; People v. Casey, 2 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 187; People v. O'Connell, 62 How. Pr. 436; King v. State, 91 Tenn. 617.

Sanity being the normal state of humanity, the prosecution on a trial for the commission of a criminal act is at liberty to rest on the presumption that the accused was sane until such presumption is overcome by defendant's evidence, and when the jury come to consider the whole case upon the evidence, they must do so upon the basis that on each and every portion of it they are to be reasonably satisfied before they are at liberty to find the defendant guilty. People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 97 Am. Dec. 162.

In People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 97 Am. Dec. 162, a number of cases holding that insanity in a criminal case must be proved by at least a preponderance of testimony were cited and criticised and disapproved, the court saying that these cases overlook or disregard an important and necessary ingredient in crime, and they strip the defendant of that presumption of innocence which the humanity of law casts over him and which attends him from the initiation of the proceedings until the verdict is rendered.

The presumption that every man is sane is sufficient to sustain the burden of proof of sanity resting with the prosecution in a criminal case until repelled by proof. O'Connell v. People, 87 N. Y. 377, 41 Am. Rep. 379; Bradley v. State, 31 Ind. 492.

And it is never incumbent upon the prosecution in a criminal case to give evidence that sanity which is presumed exists in a particular case. Walter v. People, 32 N. Y. 147; Ferris v. People, 35 N. Y. 125; O'Brien v. People, 48 Barb. 274; State v. Hoyt, 47 Conn. 518, 36 Am. Rep. 89, 46 Conn. 331.

And the presumption of general sanity may be relied on in a prosecution for homicide without offering proof of a lucid interval at the time of the commission of the offense, where only temporary or recurrent insanity is shown. Ford v. State, 73 Miss. 734, 35 L. R. A. 117.

Insanity as a defense for crime is an affirmative issue which the defendant is bound to prove, but if there is a well-founded doubt as to insanity the accused should be acquitted. Brotherton v. People, 75 N. Y. 159; State v. McIntosh, 30 S. C. 97; State v. Coleman, 20 S. C. 441; Dove v. State, 3 Helsk. 348; King v. State, 91 Tenn. 617; Coffee v. State, 3 Yerg. 283, 24 Am. Dec. 570; United States v. Lancaster, 7 Bls. 440.

In case evidence tending to rebut the presumption is introduced sanity must be affirmatively proved by the state beyond a reasonable doubt. Ford v. State, 73 Miss. 734, 35 L. R. A. 117; Bradley v. State, 31 Ind. 492.

Or at least by a preponderance of the evidence. People v. Nino, 149 N. Y. 317.

So, the accused in a prosecution for murder is entitled to an acquittal where the whole evidence, including that supplied by the presumption of sanity, does not exclude beyond a reasonable doubt the hypothesis of insanity where some proof of insanity is adduced. Davis v. United States, 160 U. S. 469, 40 L. ed. 490; State v. Crawford, 11 Kan. 32.

An admission by a person accused of crime of the facts constituting the offense, however, calls for a verdict of guilty unless the proof offered in the case as to the mental condition of the accused at the time is such as to raise in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt as to his legal responsibility for his acts. United States v. Faulkner, 35 Fed. Rep. 730.

But reasonable doubt of guilt upon the whole evidence authorizes an acquittal. State v. Smith, 53 Mo. 267.

And the defendant in a criminal prosecution is entitled to an instruction that the jury must be satisfied of his guilt beyond all reasonable doubt, and this is true of the defense of insanity so far as the facts attending the crime are concerned, or at least so far as those facts are included in the res gestæ; but if insanity is set up as a separate and distinct defense, and its proof does not consist of the facts attending the criminal act, then the proof must be made out by the defendant, the legal presumption of sanity being sufficient for the indictment in the absence of evidence to the contrary. McAllister v. Territory, 1 Wash. Terr. 380.

And it is immaterial whether the evidence tending to show insanity was adduced by the prosecution or the defense. Hodge v. State, 26 Fla. 11; Montag v. People, 141 Ill. 75; Cunningham v. State, 56 Miss. 269, 31 Am. Rep. 360; State v. Bartlett, 43 N. H. 224, 30 Am. Dec. 154; King v. State, 91 Tenn. 617.

And an instruction in a prosecution for homicide that unless the accused had by affirmative evidence created a reasonable doubt as to his sanity at the time of the act charged, that question is not before the jury for consideration, is erroneous as the defendant is equally entitled to an acquittal if a reasonable doubt is created solely by the state's own evidence. McDougal v. State, 38 Ind. 24.

So, if there is a doubt as to the sanity of a person accused of crime he should not be put upon trial, but a jury should be impaneled to try the fact. Ley's Case, 1 Lewin, C. C. 230.

The unlawful killing of a human being when perpetrated from a premeditated design to effect the death of the person killed, which constitutes murder, includes the element of a rational agency which must be shown by the state as well as any other element of the crime, and, while the law presumes all men sane, and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the court and jury are justified in acting upon such presumption, where the evidence establishes the criminal act, and indicates nothing as to the mental capacity of the accused, a conviction is authorized. If there arises from the evidence coming from any quarter a reasonable doubt require more than a mere preponderance of the evidence to establish the defense." See People v. Bell, 49 Cal. 485-488. In Bond v. State, 23 Ohio St. 349, it is held: "The burden of proof to establish the defense of insanity in a criminal case rests upon the defendant, but a bare preponderance of testimony is all that is necessary for that purpose." This rule is reasserted in Bergin v. State, 81 Ohio St. 111, a case, like the one under consideration, of murder in the first degree: Loeffner v. State, 10 Ohio St. 598. Self-defense, in Ohio, as well as insanity, is regarded as affirmative defense.

as to his sanity, the presumption of law is overcome, and he is entitled to an acquittal, unless the state meets and overcomes the reasonable doubt arising in his favor. Armstrong v. State, 30 Fla. 170, 17 L. R. A. 484.

And the jury in a criminal prosecution after all the evidence is in, while bearing in mind the presumptions that the accused is innocent until proved guilty, and that he is sane until the contrary appears, and considering the whole evidence in the case, must, if they still entertain a reasonable doubt on any ground either as to the commission of the criminal act or the responsible condition of the mind of the accused whether he is guilty or not, give him the benefit of that doubt. Guiteau's Case, 10 Fed. Rep. 161.

It is not necessary that the insanity be established by a preponderance of evidence. Jacey v. People, 116 Ill. 555; Grubb v. State, 117 Ind. 277; State v. Crawford, 11 Kan. 32; Polk v. State, 19 Ind. 170, 81 Am. Dec. 382; Guetig v. State, 66 Ind. 94, 82 Am. Rep. 99.

Or beyond a reasonable doubt. Armstrong v. State, 27 Fla. 386; Smith v. Com. 1 Duv. 224; People v. McCann, 18 N. Y. 58, 69 Am. Dec. 642.

So, in Henson v. State, 112 Ala. 41, which was a case in which a plea of self-defense was interposed, it was said that the accused should be acquitted if the jury upon all the evidence have a reasonable doubt whether he was legally capable of committing the crime, or, which is the same thing, whether he wilfully, deliberately, and unlawfully committed the act with malice aforethought.

And in the trial of General Sikkels in the district court at Washington for the murder of Philip Barton Key, Judge Crawford ruled that the burden of proving insanity was thrown on the government, and if the jury had a reasonable doubt of that fact they must acquit.

Where the jury in a criminal case believe beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed the crime, and that at the time he knew that it was wrong and was mentally capable of choosing either to do or not to do it, and of governing his conduct in accordance of such choice, however, they should find him guilty, though they believe that he was not entirely and perfectly sane. Hornish v. People, 142 Ill. 620, 18 L. R. A. 237.

So, an instruction in a prosecution for homicide authorizing conviction only provided the jury believes from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the blows were struck with malice aforethought, is not objectionable as requiring the jury to find the defendant guilty regardless of the question of his mental condition. Upstone v. People, 100 Ill. 169.

An instruction in a criminal action that the evidence as to insanity should be carefully considered for the reason that if the accused was in truth insane he ought not to be punished, is not subject to objection that the question was not whether the accused was in truth insane, but whether the jury entertained a reasonable doubt as to his sanity, as the charge was not as to the degree of evidence, 89 L. R. A.

In Silvus v. State, 22 Ohio St. 90, and Weaver v. State, 24 Ohio St. 584,—both cases where self-defense was relied upon by the accused for justification,—this court held that the defense should be shown by preponderating evidence. These cases relating to the burden and quantum of evidence required to establish a plea of self-defense are, of course, only material as tending to show the steadiness with which this court has held to the rule that a preponderance of the evidence is sufficient to sustain an affirmative defense in a criminal cause.

We come now to the question whether the but referred merely to the duty of careful scrutiny. Goodwin v. State, 96 Ind. 550.

But an instruction on a prosecution for forgery conveying the idea that before the jury can acquit the defendant on the ground of his insanity they must entertain a reasonable doubt as to whether or not such affliction was the efficient cause of the act, and as to whether or not he would have done the act but for such affliction, is incorrect; as the jury might not be willing to find that insanity was the cause of the act and yet might be in doubt whether the act was caused by insanity or not. Langdon v. People, 133 Ill. 882.

In People v. Barberi, 47 N. Y. Supp. 168, however, the rule was laid down that when evidence tending to prove insanity is given the presumption of sanity is rebutted, and if a reasonable doubt is created as to the sanity of the accused the prosecution must remove that doubt by a preponderance of the evidence.

b. What constitutes reasonable doubt.

The rational doubt which would result in an acquittal in a criminal case is a doubt as to all or any one of the constituent elements essential to legal responsibility or punishable guilt. Smith v. Com. 1 Duv. 224.

The doubt to be raised in favor of the prisoner must be a serious, well founded, satisfactory doubt. State v. Coleman, 20 S. C. 441.

And it must be reasonable, and must arise from a careful, candid investigation of all the evidence in the case. People v. Barberi, 47 N. Y. Supp. 168.

A reasonable doubt is a fair doubt growing out of the testimony in the case. It is not a mere imaginary, capitious, or possible doubt, but a fair doubt based on reason and common sense; it is such a doubt as may leave the minds of the jury after a careful examination of all the evidence in the case in such a condition that they cannot say that they have an abiding conviction to a moral certainty of the truth of the charge. People v. Finley, 38 Mich. 482.

The jury is not to acquit the prisoner upon any fanciful ground that though they believe he was sane at the time yet there might be a rational doubt of such sanity. Hodge v. State, 26 Fla. 111; Armstrong v. State, 27 Fla. 386.

Mere probability of insanity cannot prevail over the presumption of sanity, so as to effect the acquittal of a person accused of crime on that ground. Newcomb v. State, 37 Miss. 333.

The defense should not be sustained on vague and shadowy hearsay or mere conjecture. Walker v. People, 1 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 22; Boswell v. Com. 20 Gratt. 860.

There should be clear and satisfactory evidence of insanity. Walker v. People, 1 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 7; People v. Coleman, 1 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 1.

And it has been held that it should be clear strong, and convincing. State v. Marler, 2 Ala. 43, 36 Am. Dec. 398.

And that it must preponderate. State v. McIntosh, 39 S. C. 97.

instructions given by the learned judge of the court of common pleas, prescribing the quantum of evidence required to establish the defense of insanity, imposed on the plaintiff in error a higher degree of proof than the settled doctrine of the state imposed. After the learned judge had stated to the jury the claim of the plaintiff in error respecting his mental condition at the time of the homicide, he proceeded to prescribe the measure of proof requisite to maintain such claim, as follows: "In the first place, the law presumes every person who has reached the age of discretion to be of sufficient capacity to be responsible for crime; and therefore the burden of establishing the defense of insanity of the accused affirmatively to the satisfaction of the jury rests upon the defendant. It is not required, however, that this defense be established beyond a reasonable doubt; but it is sufficient if the jury is reasonably satisfied by the weight or preponderance of the evidence that the accused was insane at the time of commission of the act." This language extended the obligation resting on the accused to the extreme limits of the rule prescribed by the former decisions of this court, but we cannot say that it clearly went beyond them; and therefore, if it had halted there, error would not have intervened. The learned judge, however, after stating to the jury that the character and extent of mental aberration must be shown to exonerate the accused from criminal responsibility, returned to the subject of the quantum of evidence necessary to establish that mental state, and instructed the jury as follows: "It is not enough, I say to you, that the proof barely show that such a state of mind was possible; nor is it sufficient if it

A juror should not convict, however, unless he is so convinced by the evidence of the defendant's guilt that a prudent man would feel safe to act upon that conviction in matters of the highest concern and importance to himself, to his own dearest personal interest, under circumstances in which there was no compulsion resting upon him to act at all. Bradley v. State, 81 Ind. 492.

If a doubt is raised in the minds of the jurors as to the sanity of the accused, it devolves upon the prosecution to remove that doubt by a preponderance of the evidence. People v. Nino, 149 N. Y. 317.

Where the defense of insanity is set up in a criminal prosecution, the burden rests with the defendant to submit sufficient evidence to at least produce in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of the quality of his guilt. Faulkner v. Territory, 6 N. M. 464.

And evidence in a criminal action in which the defendant was accused of killing his wife, that his conduct was at times peculiar, and that he was nervous, and especially when talking about trouble with his wife became greatly excited, is insufficient to overcome the presumption of sanity to the extent of raising a reasonable doubt so as to require the prosecution to prove it, where it appears that he pursued his daily avocation as men generally do, and was treated by the witnesses and others as sane, and that he entertained a feeling of malignancy towards his wife. Lilly v. People, 148 Ill. 467.

But if in the trial of a person for the murder of his wife the evidence of harmonious relations between him and his wife, with the testimony of experts that he had the disease of melancholia likely to be manifested by the commission of just such an act, and that he made no attempt to escape, and attempted to kill himself, and subsequently expressed a satisfaction with respect to his act raises in the mind of the jury a reasonable doubt of his accountability which the presumption of sanity and proof on the part of the state has not removed, he should be acquitted. State v. Reidell, 9 Houst. (Del.) 470.

So, that there may have been evidence in a criminal case which, taken by itself, was sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt as to the sanity of the defendant, does not justify an acquittal, as there may have been evidence tending to rebut the defense of insanity, a reasonable doubt upon which the jury should act being required to be one arising from a consideration of all the evidence in the case. Jamison v. People, 145 Ill. 857.

And an instruction in a criminal action in which insanity is interposed as a defense that the presumption of innocence is so far of greater strength than that of sanity that when evidence appears tending to prove insanity it compels the prosecution to show, from all the evidence, mental soundness beyond a reasonable doubt, is objectionable as there may be evidence tending to prove insanity which is not sufficiently strong to raise a reasonable doubt of mental soundness; but it is not erroneous as against the accused, as it is favorable to him and he is not injured thereby. Gueltig v. State, 66 Ind. 94, 32 Am. Rep. 89.

So, in order to entitle a person accused of crime to an acquittal upon the ground of insanity he is required by evidence to establish a reasonable doubt as to his sanity, and an instruction to that effect, and a refusal to instruct that he is required only to raise a reasonable doubt, is not error. State v. Mahn, 25 Kan. 182.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution that insanity interposed as a defense must be clearly proved, is not incorrect where the jury is also told that a person must be given the benefit of any doubt as to his sanity arising upon the evidence in the case. Walker v. People, 1 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 7, Affirmed in 88 N. Y. 81.

And an instruction that the accused is presumed to be sane until he convinces the jury by evidence that he is insane is not error, where the trial had been conducted upon the theory that the burden rests with the prosecution to maintain the sanity of the prisoner, and the jury had also been instructed that if they had a reasonable doubt from the evidence that the prisoner was guilty they should give him the benefit of the doubt. O'Connell v. People, 87 N. Y. 377, 41 Am. Rep. 379.

So, an instruction in a prosecution for murder in which insanity is alleged as a defense, that before the prisoner can be exonerated on that plea the jury must be satisfied from the evidence that he was laboring under such a defect of reason as not to know the nature and quality of the act, or that he did not know to commit murder was wrong, is unimpeachable because of the use of the word "satisfied" where in other instructions the jury were told that a reasonable doubt of his guilt or of his sanity authorizes an acquittal. Brown v. Com. 14 Bush, 388.

And an instruction in a trial for homicide, that if the killing of the accused is established the law presumes it to have been murder, provided the jury believe beyond a reasonable doubt that no circumstances existed excusing or justifying the act or mitigating it, is not subject to the objection that it ignores the question of the insanity of the defendant, where the jury were elsewhere instructed as to insanity as a defense, as it recognizes that there might be an excuse for the act. Upstone v. People, 109 Ill. 169.

But an instruction in a trial for murder in which insanity is interposed as a defense, that if the accused had been subject to attacks of epilepsy, and epilepsy is a disease which tends to produce insan-merely show it to have been probable. The proof must be such as to overcome the legal presumption of sanity; it must satisfy you that he was not sane. Again, I say to you that, if the proof satisfy you of his insanity at the time of the committing of the act, though such defenses are not uncommon in the law, yet it must be regarded by you as a full and complete humane defense when satisfactorily established. If not satisfactorily established, then it should not avail the prisoner at the bar as a pretext or means of escaping punishment imposed by law." The quantum of evidence to establish insanity made necessary by this instruction, is substantially greater than a preponderance. It is not sufficient, according to this instruction, that the fact of insanity be made probable; something more than that is required; the jury ity, these facts are not sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt of his sanity at the time of the offense, is erroneous as tending to mislead the jury, and as interfering with the province of the jury to weigh the evidence. Gueltig v. State, 63 Ind. 278.

c. Submission of the question to the jury.

The insanity of a defendant in a criminal case need not be submitted to the jury as a separate issue of the absence of which they must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt; it is sufficient if they are required to be satisfied of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Hornish v. People, 142 Ill. 620, 18 L. R. A. 237.

A reasonable doubt as to the sanity of a person on trial for murder is a reasonable doubt as to his guilt, and entitles him to an acquittal. State v. Nixon, 32 Kan. 205; State v. Crawford, 11 Kan. 32.

And if, upon the whole evidence in a prosecution for homicide, the jury have a reasonable doubt whether the accused was sane when he committed the act, they must be deemed also to have had a reasonable doubt whether he purposely and maliciously committed the deed, as without sanity the crime as defined by the statute cannot be committed. Polk v. State, 19 Ind. 172, 81 Am. Dec. 332.

And evidence bearing upon the question of insanity in a criminal prosecution should be considered, in connection with all the other evidence, in determining whether or not, upon a view of the whole case, there was reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused. Carr v. State, 96 Ga. 254.

So, an instruction in a criminal prosecution that if the jury came to the conclusion beyond all reasonable doubt that the accused committed the crime, and that he was not insane, they should convict, but if any reasonable doubt arises upon the evidence and upon nothing else they should give the prisoner the benefit of that doubt and acquit him, casts the burden of establishing insanity beyond a reasonable doubt as an element of guilt upon the prosecution, and is sufficient the court not being bound to subdivide the instruction and charge separately as to each of the elements necessary to constitute the crime. Walker v. People, 88 N. Y. 81.

And refusal to instruct the jury in a criminal prosecution that if they entertain a reasonable doubt of the sanity of the accused at the time they should acquit him, is not error where the court had charged fully with reference to reasonable doubt with regard to the whole case made by the evidence. Webb v. State, 9 Tex. App. 490; Westmoreland v. State, 45 Ga. 225; O'Connell v. People, 87 N. Y. 377, 41 Am. Rep. 379.

So, refusal to charge that the defendant in a criminal prosecution is not obliged to prove his insanity to avail himself of that defense, but only to create a reasonable doubt upon that point, when must be "satisfied" that it existed. To satisfy the mind, according to the common notion of mankind, is to free it from doubt, to set it at rest. This is the primary meaning of the word, according to all the lexicographers, when used in this connection. To accomplish this result—to "satisfy" a body of men of the truth of a disputed fact—requires much more than a preponderance of the evidence. Clear and convincing evidence must be adduced in its favor. Evidence of this potency is rarely attainable in cases where insanity is contested. There must be grounds to assert insanity, founded upon some peculiar conduct, natural or feigned, of the party, or the claim will not be made. There also must be conduct consistent with mental soundness, or the claim will be conceded. Where a long course of conduct the burden of proving sanity falls upon the people, is not reversible error where the court had charged that if there was any reasonable doubt of his guilt and that he was not insane, arising upon the evidence in the case and nothing else, it would be their duty to give him the benefit of that doubt and acquit him. Walker v. People, 26 Hun. 67, Affirmed, 88 N. Y. 81.

And the failure of the court in a criminal prosecution to charge that insanity as a defense must be proved by a preponderance of the evidence, and that the burden of proof rests with the accused, and that the evidence bearing upon the question should be considered in connection with the other evidence in determining whether there was reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused, is not error in the absence of a request to so charge, where the charge given upon the subject of reasonable doubt was sufficiently full and fair to give the accused the benefit of all the evidence relating to the alleged insanity for the purpose of casting doubt upon his guilt. Carr v. State, 96 Ga. 254.

And an instruction that the accused is to be presumed to be innocent until his guilt is established by the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt is not inconsistent with another instruction that every man is presumed to be sane and to intend the natural consequences of his acts. Greenley v. State, 60 Ind. 141.

VI. Summary.

While the rule has been differently expressed in different decisions in the same state in many instances, it would seem, judging from the latest expressions on the subject, that Delaware, Maine, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, North Carolina, Texas, Virginia, West Virginia, and England may be deemed to have adopted the rule that insanity must be established to the satisfaction of the jury or by evidence which satisfies the jury.

Alabama, Arkansas, California, Georgia, Idaho, Iowa, Kentucky, Nevada, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, and Utah seemed to have settled upon the rule that it must be established by a preponderance of proof.

And Connecticut, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Michigan, Mississippi, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New York, Tennessee, Washington, and the United States seem to have settled upon the rule that a well-founded doubt of sanity warrants an acquittal, and that the prosecution must establish sanity beyond a reasonable doubt.

As to the rule in Louisiana and Oregon, see supra, I.

State courts are not bound by the views of the Supreme Court of the United States on the question of the measure of proof of insanity as a defense in a criminal prosecution. People v. Allen, 117 Cal. 81.

F. H. B.

is established, or a large number of mental or physical acts of a party are adduced, and parts of this conduct and some of the acts tend to establish mental aberration, while the others consist with mental soundness, the whole evidence might not satisfy a jury that the mind of the party was disordered to the extent of rendering him criminally irresponsible for his acts; and yet might preponderate upon that side sufficiently to engender a belief that such mental condition was probable,—that is, likely,—or supported by evidence sufficient to incline the mind to that belief, but which leaves some room for doubt. Webster.

Doubtless, insanity is a defense that may be feigned, and frequently is, where no other defense is available; but because artful criminals may adopt it as a last resort is not a sufficient reason to impose upon the unfortunate, in whose behalf this humane defense is honestly interposed, a higher degree of proof than intrinsically belongs to it. The remedy for this mischief is a searching analysis by counsel, court, and jury of the conduct of the party wherever there is reason to suspect that the insanity is feigned. The learned judge may have been misled as to the quantum requisite to establish the defense of insanity in a criminal case by a note found at the end of the case of Clark v. State, 12 Ohio, 488, 40 Am. Dec. 481, which purports to give the charge of Judge Birchard, who presided at the trial in the court of common pleas. The language imputed to Judge Birchard by that note was disapproved by the circuit court of the second circuit in a well-considered case reported by Judge Shauck, now a member of this court.

Sharkey v. State, 4 Ohio C. C. 101. By what authority that language is ascribed to Judge Birchard does not appear. If such language was employed by that learned judge it was at a period in our judicial history before the question of the burden of proof in such case had been finally settled. In the charge referred to Judge Birchard explicitly laid down the rule, still adhered to by this court, that the burden of proof rested on the accused to establish his insanity. Nothing appears in the case however, to show that the degree of proof necessary to sustain this burden was discussed by counsel or specially considered by this court. Since then, in the case of Bond v. State, 28 Ohio St. 349, this court held that a bare preponderance of the evidence was sufficient to establish this defense. This rule was adhered to in Bergin v. State, 81 Ohio St. 111. The original contention, as we have seen, respected the party upon whom the burden rested. This court adopted the view of this question most unfavorable to the accused, by casting upon him the burden of proving his insanity, but we do not think this burden should be further increased by requiring of him more than a preponderance of the evidence. As the instructions given to the jury by the learned judge who presided at the trial in the court of common pleas prescribed more than this, it was erroneous in this respect.

Other questions are raised by the record and discussed by counsel, but we think none of them contain any substantial error.

Judgment reversed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT (Division 1).

I. T. CLARKSON et al., Repts.,

v.

Frank A. HATTON, Appt.

1. The consent of the natural parents or guardian of a child to its adoption is not required by 1 Wag. Stat. p. 256, § 1.
2. "Children" and "heirs" of a life tenant to whom the remainder is given by Rev. Stat. 1855, p. 355, chap. 32, § 6, under a deed to a person and his "bodily heirs," do not include an adopted child of such life tenant, where there was no law authorizing an adoption of children at the time of the enactment of such statute, since the life tenant cannot destroy the vested right of the statutory heirs by an adoption.

(February 23, 1896.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Mississippi County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover possession of real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. J. Cantwell, William N. Randolph, and James A. Boone for appellant.

Messrs. Russell & Deal, for respondents: This title was passed upon by division No. 1 of this court, and its opinion ought to have settled all controversy over the lands in dispute.

Clarkson v. Clarkson, 125 Mo. 387.

The so-called deeds of adoption were irregular and void, as the facts showed the child had a father living in the same county who had never consented to such adoption.

Luppie v. Winans, 87 N. J. Eq. 245.

An adopted child is not in fact an heir at law, but an heir by contract. An adopted child can by reason of the contract of the adopting parent inherit from him, but an adopted child is not an heir so far as to affect the rights of others.

Reinders v. Koppelman, 94 Mo. 344; Keegan v. Geraghty, 101 Ill. 26; Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 282.

The word "children" as commonly used does not include an adopted child.

Schofer v. Eneu, 54 Pa. 804.

v. Sankey (Ill.) 23 L. R. A. 666; Murphy v. Portrum (Tenn.) 30 L. R. A. 263; and Hartwell v. Tefft (R. I.) 34 L. R. A. 500.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment to recover possession of certain land in Mississippi county. The petition was in the usual form. The defense set up in the answer was that defendant is in possession, as curator, of the estate of Roy Congers, a minor, who is averred to be the owner in fee of the land. A reply was filed, denying the new matter contained in the answer. The cause was tried before the court without a jury, and resulted in a judgment for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals. The action was instituted on February 25, 1895, and tried at the ensuing April term of the Mississippi county circuit court. It was admitted that Jabez Clarkson was the common source of title. On November 9, 1858, Jabez Clarkson conveyed the land in question by warranty deed, to his son, John Clarkson, and his "bodily heirs." John Clarkson was in possession of the land at the time said deed was executed, and continued to reside thereon until 1890, at which time he died, leaving his wife, Sarah Clarkson, surviving, who died in 1894, prior to the commencement of this suit. John Clarkson, had no children or their descendants living at the date of said deed, and none were born to him after that time. The plaintiffs are the only living brothers and sisters of John Clarkson. Not having an heir born of his body, John Clarkson and his wife, Sarah, on the 11th day of July, 1887, by their deed duly executed, acknowledged, and recorded, adopted Roy Congers, who survived them as their child and heir. In the recent case of Clarkson v. Clarkson, 125 Mo. 381, this court held that the deed from Jabez Clarkson to John Clarkson created an estate tail, which our statute, eo instanti, converted into a life estate in John Clarkson, with remainder in fee to his children. Black, P. J., who wrote the opinion after stating the facts, says: "On this state of facts the plaintiffs insist that the title passed to them. The question must be determined by § 5, chap. 32, of the Revised Statutes, 1855, the statute in force when the deed was executed. It provides that every conveyance or devise which would have created an estate tail under the statute of the thirteenth Edward First 'shall vest an estate for life only in such grantee or devisee, who shall possess and have the same power over, and right in, such premises, and no other, as a tenant for life thereof would have by law; and upon the death of such grantee or devisee, the said lands and tenements shall go, and be vested in the children of such grantee or devisee, equally to be divided between them as tenants in common, in fee; and if there be only one child, then to that one, in fee; and if any child be dead, the part which would have come to him or her shall go to his or her issue, and, if there be no issue, then to his or her heirs.' This statute disposed of the entire estate conveyed by the deed. It vested in John Clarkson a life estate and no more. As he had no children or their descendants living either at the date of the deed or at his death, the remainder vested, according to the last clause of the section of the statute just quoted, in his brothers and sisters and the heirs of those who were dead, he having no father or mother living at his death."

The statute then and now under consideration reads: "That, from and after the passage of this act, where any conveyance or devise shall be made whereby the grantee or devisee shall become seised in law or equity of such estate, in any lands or tenements, as, under the statute of the thirteenth Edward the First (called the 'Statute of Entails'), would have been held an estate in fee tail, every such conveyance or devise shall vest an estate for life only in such grantee or devisee, who shall possess and have the same power over and right in such premises, and no other, as a tenant for life thereof would have by law; and upon the death of such grantee or devisee, the said lands and tenements shall go and be vested in the children of such grantee or devisee, equally to be divided between them as tenants in common, in fee, and, if there be only one child, then to that one, in fee; and, if any child be dead, the part which would have come to him or her shall go to his or her issue; and if there be no issue, then to his or her heirs." Rev. Stat. 1855, p. 855, chap. 32, § 5.

The defendant contends that as to the land in question, under the statutory estate so created, the remainder after the death of John Clarkson vested in Roy Congers, the adopted child, as the only child of John Clarkson, under the word "children," used in the statute above noted, or the word "heirs," in the last clause of said section. The plaintiffs, however, claim, and the circuit court so held, following Clarkson v. Clarkson, 125 Mo. 381, that, as John Clarkson had no children living at the time of his death, the remainder vested in his brothers and sisters and their descendants. It is objected, further, that this deed of adoption is not legal and valid because it does not appear that the father of the adopted child consented to such adoption. The statute under which the deed of adoption was executed, provides: "If any person in this state shall desire to adopt any child, or children, as his or her heir or devisee, it shall be lawful for such person to do the same by deed, which deed shall be executed, acknowledged, and recorded in the county of the residence of the person executing the same, as in the case of conveyance of real estate." 1 Wagner, Stat. p. 256, § 1. No provision is made by the statute, in a case like the present, for the consent of the natural parents of the party sought to be adopted. It has been held by this court that neither the natural parents nor guardian of the child or children proposed to be adopted are required to join in the execution of the deed of adoption or consent thereto in order to entitle the child to inherit from the adopted parents. Reinders v. Koppelman, 68 Mo. 482, 30 Am. Rep. 802; Re Clements, 78 Mo. 352. The case of Luppie v. Winans, 37 N. J. Eq. 245, relied upon by plaintiffs in support of their position, has no application here. The statute of New Jersey expressly requires the consent of the parents to the act of adoption. Under the statutes of that state, the act of adoption divests the natural parents of all control over the child so adopted. We are of opinion, therefore, that the adoption of Roy Congers in this case was valid.

The next inquiry for our determination is: What are the rights of the adopted child?

Can the adopted child in this case take property expressly limited to the "heirs of the body of the parents by adoption?" It is argued by counsel for plaintiffs that the decision by this court in Clarkson v. Clarkson, 125 Mo. 881, is decisive of that question. In the concluding paragraph of that opinion the court says: "The defendant makes the point that the adopted child of John and Sarah Clarkson was a child within the meaning of the statute, . . . and hence the remainder passed to the adopted child. It is now sufficient to say no such question is presented by this record. The deed of adoption was excluded by the trial court on the objection of the plaintiffs who are the appellants. The defendant took no appeal, and is not, by the record, here complaining of any ruling of the trial court." The question whether the adopted child was within the provision of the statute was not in that case, and not before the court. The court simply held, as the record in the case showed, that John Clarkson left no children; and, not having a father or mother living at the time of his death the remainder vested in his brothers and sisters according to the last clause of the statute. The statute provides: "From the time of filing the deed with the recorder, the child or children adopted shall have the same right against the person or persons executing the same, for support and maintenance and for proper and humane treatment, as a child has, by law, against lawful parents; and such adopted child shall have, in all respects, and enjoy all such rights and privileges as against the persons executing the deed of adoption. This provision shall not extend to other parties, but is wholly confined to parties executing the deed of adoption." 1 Wagner, Stat. p. 256, § 8. Adoption was unknown to the common law, being repugnant to its principles and the institution upon which it was builded, but was recognized by the civil law from its earliest day, and exists in this country by the statutes of every state so far as we have had occasion to examine. The child becomes, in a legal sense, the child of the adopting parents, and at the same time remains the child of its natural parents, and is not deprived of its rights of inheritance from them unless expressly so provided by statute. Wagner v. Varner, 50 Iowa, 534. In Moran v. Stewart, 122 Mo. 295, a construction was put upon this statute in conformity with this view. Upon this subject the court said: "This and other sections of the statute concerning the adoption of children have been before this court, directly and indirectly, on several occasions. Reinders v. Koppelman, 68 Mo. 482, 80 Am. Rep. 802, 94 Mo. 388; Sharkey v. McDermott, 91 Mo. 647, 60 Am. Rep. 270; Davis v. Hendricks, 99 Mo. 478; Fosburgh v. Rogers, 114 Mo. 122, 19 L. R. A. 201. The conclusion to be drawn from these cases, so far as they bear upon the question in hand, is this: The husband or wife, or both, may adopt a child as his, her, or their heir, and the adopted child will inherit from the adopting parent or parents, the same as if born of such adopting parent or parents in lawful wedlock. For all the purposes of inheriting from the adopting parent the adopted child becomes, and is, the lawful child of such adopting parent." Such has been the generally accepted interpretation put upon the statute of adoption by the American courts.

By the act of adoption, Roy Congers became the child and heir, in a certain sense, of John and Sarah Clarkson; but it does not follow that such adopted child takes the statutory estate created under the Revised Statutes of 1855, the statute in force when the deed in question was executed. The phrase "bodily heirs" is a well-established technical term, and is defined in Anderson, Law Dict. 508, as "an heir begotten of the body; a lineal descendant." The words "children," "issue," and "heirs," are not synonymous terms. The rule of construction is that technical words or phrases which have acquired a peculiar and appropriate meaning in law shall be construed according to such peculiar and appropriate meaning unless it appears that the words were not used in their technical sense. When words and phrases have received a fixed legal interpretation by repeated decisions, such words and phrases when employed in deeds or other written instruments, are to receive such fixed legal interpretation as a long line of decisions attached to them. In consequence of the application of this rule to the construction of the deed from Jabez to John Clarkson, it was held, in Clarkson v. Clarkson, 125 Mo. 881, that John Clarkson only acquired a life estate. That the grantor therein named intended to use the term "bodily heirs" in its primary technical sense, there can be no doubt. In Reinders v. Koppelman, 94 Mo. 388, it was held, in construing the provisions of a will in which the testator gave his wife a life estate in all his property, and at her death one half the remainder to the nearest and lawful heirs of the testator and that of his wife, the testator and his wife each having brothers and sisters living at the date of the will, that an adopted child was not entitled to inherit under the provisions of the will, but that the remainder went to the brothers and sisters of the testator's wife. Upon this subject the court said: "In common parlance, we find that the terms, 'heir-at-law' and 'lawful heirs,' are used indiscriminately, as synonymous and convertible terms, and whenever either is used, they are invariably referred to the heirs upon whom descent is cast by law, and not upon an heir by adoption. The relation of an heir by adoption is an exceptional and unusual one, and does not come within the ordinary and usual meaning of the words, 'lawful heirs,' and those words ought not to be held ex vi termini, to include an adopted heir." In the concluding paragraph of the opinion, in speaking of the intention of the testator, the court remarked: "It is impossible to believe that he could have intended the child of a stranger manufactured into an heir by deed. The testator devised to his widow a life estate, the remainder to others; in that remainder she had no interest; she could neither convey it by deed nor devise it by will; she had no more power to convey it by a deed of adoption than by a deed in any other form; that which she could not do directly, she cannot be permitted to do indirectly." When the statute of 1855, now under consideration, was passed, there was no law in this state authorizing the adoption of children, the adoption statutes not having passed until some years later. The language of the statute shows that the legislature intended to use the words "children" or "heirs" in their primary technical sense, as lineal descendants when applied to "children," and as heirs upon whom the law cast the estate immediately on the death of the ancestor when applied to heirs, and that a child or heir by adoption was not contemplated. This is unquestionably in line with the drift of modern judicial thought.

John Clarkson, having only a life estate in the premises in controversy, was powerless to convey the remainder by deed of adoption or by any other method known to law. If, then, he could not convey or in any wise dispose of the remainder, it would be illogical to say that, by the contractual rights conferred by the deed of adoption, he could convert a mere stranger into an heir, so as to work a result which was not in his power to effect by usual methods, and thereby change the descent and devolution of such remainder. It was not in the power of John Clarkson to take away the statutory estate so created, and vested in his brothers and sisters if he had no bodily heirs, and confer the same upon an adopted child. The right to inherit by virtue of a deed of adoption does not make the beneficiary a "bodily heir"—a child, in fact—of the adopting parent or parents. In Schafer v. Eneu, 54 Pa. 304, it was held that the adopted children are not children of the persons by whom they have been adopted, and that the act of the legislature in passing the adoption statute did not attempt the impossible, the court saying: "Giving an adopted son a right to inherit does not make him a son in fact, and he is so regarded in law, only to give the right to inherit." In the case of Keegan v. Geraghty, 101 Ill. 26, Sheldon, J., in an opinion of that court holding that an adopted child can take by descent only from the person adopting, and not from the lineal and collateral kindred of the adopting parent, uses this pertinent language: "We cannot admit this anomalous right, here claimed in a stranger in blood, to take by descent in exclusion of kindred, to be given by any doubtful implication or vague generality of language. As against the adopted child the statute should be strictly construed, because it is in derogation of the general law of inheritance which is founded on natural relationship, and is a rule of succession according to nature which has prevailed from time immemorial." Although the above-cited cases may differ somewhat in detail from the case at bar, yet the principles upon which they turn apply to and are decisive of it. We are therefore of the opinion that, as to the land in controversy, Roy Congers is not to be deemed a child, within the meaning of the act of 1855, above cited, and that the remainder does not pass to such adopted child. The authorities cited by counsel for defendant in support of their contention bear upon the right of the adopted child to inherit from the adopting parents, and do not affect the question in this case.

In the view we have taken of the case involved in this record, the court committed no error in refusing defendant's first, second, and third declarations of law. But it is insisted that the court erred in refusing the seventh instruction asked in behalf of defendant, to the effect that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover rents and profits for any period preceding the commencement of this action. Under § 4638 of the Revised Statutes of 1889, plaintiff in ejectment is entitled to recover only rents and profits for a period previous to the commencement of an action, when it is shown on the trial that the defendant had knowledge of the plaintiff's claim prior to the commencement of the action. It is conceded that there was no evidence of such knowledge in this case. The law applicable to questions of this nature has been so often declared in favor of the contention of appellant that it is scarcely necessary to repeat it. See Robidoux v. Casseleggi, 81 Mo. 459, and cases cited.

For the refusal to give plaintiff's seventh instruction, the case is reversed and remanded, with directions that judgment be entered in accordance with the views herein expressed, computing rents and profits from February 25, 1895, the date of the institution of this suit.

grant did not contemplate that any person should exclusively and permanently appropriate any portion of a street to his own use, to the continued exclusion of the remainder of the public therefrom.

4. Whether the use made of a street is an additional burden upon the easement does not depend upon the motive power which moves the vehicles employed in such use, but depends upon whether the vehicle and appliances used in and necessary to effectuate the purpose permanently and exclusively occupy a portion of the street, to the continued exclusion of the rest of the public therefrom.

5. A corporation constructed in a street its railway tracks, and set poles at stated distances apart on either side of said tracks, near the margin of said streets. On these poles it placed wires, and used these poles and wires for the moving of its cars on said tracks by electricity. An abutting lotowner sued the railway company for damages, alleging in his petition that the continued existence in the street opposite his property of the poles and wires interfered with his ingress to and egress from his premises and depreciated them in value. Held, that the petition stated a cause of action.

6. What acts, omissions, facts, and circumstances are competent evidence of damages, to be considered by a jury, are questions of law for the court; but whether such acts, omissions, facts, or circumstances affect an owner's property, and damage it, and the amount of such damages, are for the jury.

7. It seems that by reason of article 1, § 21, of our Constitution, it is not absolutely essential that the poles and wires of an electric street-railway company should be held, as a matter of law, to be an additional burden upon the easement, in order to entitle the abutting lotowner to compensation for the depreciation to his real estate, caused by the permanent and continued presence in the street in front thereof of such poles and wires.

Ragan, C., filed the following opinion:

Minnie L. Jaynes brought this suit to the district court of Douglas county against the Omaha Street-Railway Company, hereinafter called the "Railway Company," a corporation organized under the laws of the state, and owning and operating an electric street railway in the streets of the city of Omaha, by permission of the city's authority. Jaynes in her petition alleged, among other things, that she was the owner of lot 8, in block 15, in R. V. Smith's addition to the city of Omaha; that said lot was a tract of land 248 feet in length east and west, and 66 feet in width north and south; that it was bounded on the east by Sixteenth street, and on the south by Clark street; that the railway company had constructed its railway over and upon and along the surface of said Sixteenth and Clark streets, in front of her property, and was operating its cars thereon, the motive power being electricity; that the railway company, for the purpose of so operating its cars, had erected poles on either side of said streets adjacent to her premises, and placed a wire upon said poles parallel to the railway track, and had strung wires across said streets on said poles; that, by reason of such construction and operation of said railway on said tracks adjacent to said premises, the value of the latter had been greatly depreciated; that the location of the poles and wires of the railway company in said streets interfered with Jaynes' ingress to and egress from her property, and thereby depreciated its value. There was a prayer for a judgment for damages. To this petition the railway company filed a general demurrer, based on its contention that the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The district court sustained the demurrer, and dismissed the petition, and Jaynes brings that judgment here for review on error.

1. By §§ 104-106, art. 1, chap. 14, Comp. Stat. 1897, it is made the duty of every original owner or proprietor of any tract of land, who shall subdivide the same for the purpose of laying it out in an addition to a city, to cause a plat of such subdivision to be made, with reference to known or permanent monuments, and in such plat give the dimensions and the courses of all streets and alleys established thereby, and to execute and acknowledge this plat before some officer authorized to take acknowledgments of deeds, and, when so executed, to file such plat for record in the office of the register of deeds of the proper county.

The acknowledgment and record of such an instrument is equivalent to a deed in fee simple of such portion of the premises platted as is on such plat set apart for streets and other public purposes. Assuming that Smith was the original owner of the lands out of which the lots of Jaynes were carved, and that he complied with the statute just quoted, and thereby dedicated these streets to the public, and thereby conveyed the fee-simple title of these streets to the city of Omaha; we have the question: For what purpose was this dedication or grant made? The particular purposes which were in the mind of the owner at the time he made this dedication or grant are not expressed therein; and the question therefore is, For what purpose does the law imply or presume the owner granted these streets to the public? Is the construction and operation of such an electric railway as the one here, on the surface of these streets, embraced in the purposes for which the original owner dedicated these streets to the public? Or, in the language of the lawbooks, is the construction and operation of this street railway an additional burden or servitude on the easement granted?

It is said by Booth in § 83 of his work on Street Railways, that the courts of last resort of the country, to which the question has been presented, have all decided that the construction and operation of such a street railway as the one in question here was not an additional servitude to those embraced in the original grant. The courts referred to by this author are Kentucky, Michigan, Maryland, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Utah, and the United States circuit court for the district of Arkansas. We shall briefly examine these cases.

The Kentucky case was decided in 1893, and is Louisville Bagging Mfg. Co. v. Central Pass. R. Co. 95 Ky. 50. It was an application for an injunction by the owner of a lot fronting on a street to enjoin the construction and maintenance of an electric street railway on two grounds: (1) That it would interfere with the lotowner's accustomed use of the street for backing vehicles up to his warehouse; (2) would be dangerous to those residing or doing business on the street. The nisi prius court denied the application for injunction, and its judgment was affirmed by the court of appeals; but the question as to whether the construction and operation of the street railway was an additional burden is not mentioned in the case, nor is the question as to whether the street-railway company would be liable to damages for the injury done to the lotowner's property by the construction and operation of the railway either argued or discussed in the opinion; and though the question as to whether electric street railways were additional burdens had, prior to that date, been presented to several courts of last resort, no case of any court is cited in the opinion.

The case from the United States circuit court for the district of Arkansas is Williams v. City Electric Street R. Co. 41 Fed. Rep. 556. In that case the United States circuit court held that the construction and operation of a street railway on the streets of a city was not an additional burden simply because of the fact that the cars were moved by steam. That was the only point in the case. No such question as the one here was involved in the Arkansas case.

The Utah case referred to is Ogden City R. Co. v. Ogden City, 7 Utah, 207. This case was decided in 1891, and was an application for an injunction by the Ogden City Railway Company against Ogden city and another railway company, to enjoin Ogden city from carrying into effect an ordinance granting to this other railway company permission to lay a double-tracked street railway in a certain street of Ogden city,—the contention of the Ogden City Railway Company being that in 1888 Ogden city by ordinance had granted it permission to lay down a double-tracked street railway in said streets; that it had already constructed a single track, with turnouts, in that street; and that if the other railway company was granted permission to construct another double-track railway in the same street, the streets would be so obstructed by the four tracks as to interfere with other modes of travel; and that if the defendant street-railway company, in constructing its track, should use poles and wires, the plaintiff street railway's property would be greatly damaged thereby. The injunction was denied. The court said: "The allegations of fact are not sufficient to warrant an injunction on the ground that the construction of the defendant's railway would damage the abutting property by materially interfering with rights appurtenant thereto." We do not think this is an adjudication that the construction and operation of an electric street railway in the streets of a city is not an additional burden; and, though that question had prior to that time been before the courts of Rhode Island and New Jersey, the opinions in those cases are not referred to, nor is there an opinion of any other court mentioned.

The earliest case that we have been able to find in which the question under consideration was decided is Taggart v. Newport Street R. Co. 16 R. I. 668, 7 L. R. A. 205, decided in January, 1890. This was an application for an injunction by abutting property owners to enjoin the street-railway company from erecting poles and wires, as concomitants of their street railway, in front of the complainant's property. It appears that prior to the time the suit was brought the street-railway company had been using horses to move its cars, and were about to substitute electricity as a motive power. In the opinion the court enumerates the grounds upon which the injunction was asked as (1) that the street-railway company had not given certain notices required by the law of its incorporation; (2) that the use of electricity was illegal, as the statute creating the street-railway company authorized it to use as a motive power, "steam, horse, or other power as the councils of said city and towns may from time to time direct;" (3) that the erection of the poles was prohibited by the act incorporating the street-railway company, as that act provided that the street railway should be used, constructed, and operated so that "such corporation shall not encumber any portion of the streets occupied by such tracks." The court held that the company had given the notice required by statute; that the use of electricity as a motive power was expressed within the law creating the corporation; and that the poles in the street were not an encumbrance, within the meaning of the act creating the corporation, taking Webster's definition of the word "encumber." The court denied the injunction, and said in the fifth point of the syllabus [19 Atl. 826]: "The change of the power by which a street railway is operated from horse-power to electricity, and the erection of poles necessary for its operation, does not impose an additional burden on the abutting property owners." The court reached this conclusion, that the street railway, with its poles and wires, was not an additional burden, by finding that the electric street railway company did not occupy the streets any more exclusively than it would if operated by horse power. There is no question that the law of the case was correctly laid down if the evidence, or the record on its face, sustains the finding of fact made by the court that the electric street railway no more exclusively occupies the street than an ordinary horse railway.

The Rhode Island case just noticed was quoted as an authority for the proposition that an electric street railway is not an additional burden by the supreme court of New Jersey in December, 1890, in Halsey v. Rapid Transit Street R. Co. 47 N. J. Eq. 380. In this case an abutting lotowner sought to enjoin a street-railway company from building its track in a street opposite his premises, and from erecting certain iron poles in the center of the street, to be used in the operation of its cars. The court denied the injunction, and held that the placing of the poles in the middle of the street, for the purpose of using electricity for street-car propulsion, did not impose a new servitude on the land in the street. But it would seem, from a reading of the opinion, that the complainant's application for an injunction was denied on the ground of the court's doubt as to whether the complainant's property had been or would be damaged by the erection of these poles in the center of the street opposite his property. The court said: "It is true there is a very small space in the middle of the street over which a wagon approaching the entrance cannot pass, but it may pass on either side. Besides, the distance of the pole from the entrance renders it very improbable, as it seems to me, that a wagon, in passing from the street to the entrance, would, if there was no pole there, pass over this space one time in fifty. Certain it is that, even if it be true that the pole diminishes the complainant's means of access to the entrance, the diminution is so insignificant as to lay no ground for relief in equity. A doubt as to whether the complainant's land in the street has been appropriated to a purpose for which the public have no right to use it will, at this stage of the cause, be fatal to his claim to an injunction. . . . It is impossible to emphasize too strongly the rule so often enforced in this court, that a preliminary injunction will not be allowed where either the complainant's right, which he seeks to have protected in limine by an interlocutory injunction, is in doubt, or where the injury which may result from the invasion of that right is not irreparable."

The supreme court of Pennsylvania in January, 1891, in Lockhart v. Craig Street R. Co. 139 Pa. 419, referred to the Rhode Island case as being directly in point, and, if good law, controlling the case under consideration. The Pennsylvania case was an application for an injunction by abutting property owners to restrain the street-railway company from constructing and operating its road in a street in front of the complainants' property. The court denied the injunction, and stated the question to be whether the construction of the street railway, with its poles and wires, amounted to a taking of the property of the complainants without compensation. The court said: "The placing of the wires over the streets does not appear to be a taking of plaintiff's property. The streets are dedicated to the public use, and a citizen has certain special rights, as an abutting owner, but I cannot see how a wire run through the air above the streets can be said to be a taking, injury, or a destroying of his property. But another question arises in reference to the posts placed in the ground for the support of the wires by means of which the cars are moved. . . . And it may be now taken as settled that the owner's rights as to abutting property are subject to the paramount right of the public, and the rights of the public are not limited to a mere right of way, but extend to all beneficial legitimate street uses, such as the public may from time to time require. . . . The case of Taggart v. Newport Street R. Co. 16 R. I. 668, 7 L. R. A. 205, . . . is directly in point, and, if good law, covers the case in hand. My own impression is that the use of poles, wires, and other necessary appliances, such as are proposed to be used by defendants, is not, in any respect, a greater interference with the ownership of the adjoining property owner on a street than the use of streets for fire plugs, horse troughs," etc. "To my mind, the power in the Craig Street Railway Company to construct and maintain a railroad, on compliance with the terms of the act under which it was incorporated, is clear, and that these defendants have shown a legal right to proceed and construct the railway contemplated by them, unless the failure to provide means by which the plaintiff may have such damages as they may sustain, assessed and paid, or secured in advance, renders the act unconstitutional. Upon this question I am not free from doubt, but the decided inclination of my mind is that the act is not unconstitutional for that reason, because the uses of the streets for the purpose of applying motive power in the manner proposed is not such a new use as in cities should be treated as outside the proper purpose for which streets will be held to have been originally dedicated to the public use. Taggart v. Newport Street R. Co. before cited, is exactly in point. The case presented by plaintiffs is certainly not so clear from doubt that a chancellor should grant an injunction, summarily stopping a great public improvement before final hearing, more particularly if the position taken by plaintiffs is correct, and defendants have no legal right to take possession of the streets, as they are about to do. A common-law action will compel them to pay all damages arising to plaintiffs, and thereafter equity would probably afford a complete remedy, by which the wrong done them could be fully corrected." It seems from this that the supreme court of Pennsylvania did not decide, at least in this case, that an abutting property owner was remediless if the construction of the street railway in front of his property damaged it, but denied the abutting property owner an injunction to restrain the erection of the improvement, leaving the question as to whether he was damaged, and, if so, how much, to the law courts.

In Detroit City R. Co. v. Mills, 85 Mich. 634, decided May, 1891, the street-railway company was erecting its poles and constructing its track in a street in front of a lotowner's property. The lotowner cut the poles down, and threatened to continue to do so as long as they were erected, and thereupon the railway company enjoined the lotowner from interfering with its construction of its railway. The nisi prius court made the injunction perpetual. The property owner appealed, and the supreme court affirmed the judgment. The question as to whether the proposed erection of the poles and wires and tracks on the street constituted an additional burden upon the easement seems to have been much discussed in the case. In the syllabus [48 N. W. 1007] the court said: "The use of the street for street railways, in such a way as not to interfere with the right of a lotowner, as one of the public to pass and repass thereon, or with the right of ingress or egress to and from his lot, does not impose a new burden and servitude, additional to what was implied by the dedication, which it is beyond the power of the city to authorize without additional compensation to the abutting lotowners." The court was composed of five judges. Two of these judges seem to have been of opinion that the street railway involved in the action, as it was proposed to be constructed, was not or would not be an additional burden upon the easement. Two of the judges dissented from that opinion, and the third concurred in affirming the judgment of the lower court, but said: "I am not prepared to say that the construction of a street-railroad track in a street is of itself no additional burden or servitude upon the street. I think it is, but to what extent depends upon all the facts and circumstances under which it is imposed."

The cases heretofore alluded to from Kentucky, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania are referred to in the majority opinion as authorities for the proposition that an electric street-railway track, with its wires and poles, is not an additional burden. But the most that can be said for the Michigan case is that whether such a street railway is or is not an additional burden is a question of fact, depending upon whether or not it is so operated and constructed as to interfere with the lotowner's right of ingress and egress to and from his property and his free use of the street.

The Maryland case referred to by Booth is Koch v. North Ave. R. Co. (decided Jan. 1892), 75 Md. 222, 15 L. R. A. 377. It was an application by abutting lotowners to enjoin a street-railway company from constructing its road in a certain street in front of their property. The application was based upon four grounds: (1) That the defendant was not lawfully incorporated; (2) that it had no right to lay tracks of its own outside of tracks already laid in the street by street-railway companies; (3) that the city of Baltimore had no authority to authorize the railway to use electricity as a motive power; (4) that the road proposed to be built was an elevated road, within the meaning of the statute, which provided that no elevated road should be built in that street. The court overruled each of these contentions, and denied the injunction. The cases already alluded to from Rhode Island, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the Federal district of Arkansas are referred to in the opinion, and it is said of them that "they proceed on the principle that a street is a way set apart for public travel, and that the use of electricity for propelling street cars is but a new and improved motive power, in no manner inconsistent with the uses and purposes for which streets were opened and dedicated as ways for public travel." And the court decides that the use of electricity as a motive power for street cars does not impose a new servitude upon the streets, so as to entitle the abutting owner to compensation. But the question as to whether poles and wires placed in a street in front of an abutting owner's premises constituted an additional servitude, entitling him to compensation, was neither presented to nor decided by the court.

In San Antonio Rapid Transit Street R. Co. v. Limburger [88 Tex. 79] 80 S. W. 533, "the supreme court of Texas held that the use of a street for an electric railway does not impose an additional burden or servitude to that implied by the dedication." That was an action by an abutting property owner against a street-railway company to recover damages which he alleged his property had sustained by the construction of a street-railway track between the curb of the street and another railway track in the street. The cases hereinbefore referred to were cited by the supreme court of Texas as authorities for the conclusion reached by it. But it is to be noticed that in the Texas case there is not one word on the subject of poles and wires. It does not appear whether or not this street-railway company used any poles and wires for the operation of its road. So far as the opinion discloses, the whole complaint of the abutting property owner was the presence in the street in front of his property of the tracks and the cars thereon. These are all the cases which I have been able to find which hold (if they do) that an electric street railway, with its concomitants of poles and wires, is not an additional burden, and, if the abutting owner's property is damaged by the use of the streets for such poles and wires, that he has no remedy for such damages.

The leading case is the Rhode Island case, and the conclusion reached there was predicated upon the court's finding that the electric street railway did not occupy any more exclusively any portion of the street than an ordinary horse railway would. If all the other cases follow the Rhode Island case, and if it can be said that these cases are authority for the proposition contended for here, that an electric street railway, with its wires and poles, is not an additional burden, then it is worth while to observe that the principle upon which the cases rest is the one mentioned by the Rhode Island court, namely, not an exclusive and continued occupation of a part of a street to the exclusion of the rest of the public. That principle is sound. But in the case at bar there is no room for the conclusion that the street-railway company, by the poles and wires which it has placed in the street, does not exclusively occupy a portion of that street to the exclusion of the rest of the public.

Looking at the original platting of Jaynes' property, and the dedication made by the then owner of the lots of a part of it for a street, we think the true construction of the grant made is this: That the grantor intended that the street should be used for the purpose of enabling the public to pass and repass thereon; that it might pass on foot, on horseback, or in vehicles, and that whether the motive power of the vehicles should be steam, electricity, horse power, compressed air, or any other power. The grant contemplated the right of the public to temporarily use any part and all of these streets for the purpose of passing over them in any manner that it might choose, and by such means as it might see fit to employ. But the grant did not contemplate that any person or corporation might exclusively and permanently appropriate any part of these streets to its use, to the continued exclusion of the rest of the public.

In the case at bar the railway company, with its poles and wires, has exclusively appropriated a portion of these streets to its own use, to the exclusion of the rest of the public. If the railway company were moving its cars on the surface of these streets by electric power, without so permanently and exclusively occupying any portion of the street, we do not think the mere fact that the motive power used was electricity would take the use out of the purpose contemplated by the original grant. The use made of these streets by the railway company is not one in common with that of the public generally. Its poles and wires remain, and must remain, and exclusively occupy, particular portions of the street, and continuously exclude the public from such portions. Whether a use made of a street is an additional burden upon the easement we do not think depends upon the motive power which moves the vehicle employed. It depends upon the question whether the vehicle and appliances used in and necessary to effectuate that purpose permanently and exclusively occupy all or a portion of the street, to the continued exclusion of the rest of the public. If they do not, then it is not an additional burden; if they do, it is.

It has been almost universally held, we think, that an ordinary street railway, whose cars were moved by horses, was not an additional burden. See, among others, the following authorities: Atty. Gen. v. Metropolitan R. Co. 125 Mass. 515, 28 Am. Rep. 264; Citizens' Coach Co. v. Camden Horse R. Co. 83 N. J. Eq. 267, 86 Am. Rep. 542; Hobart v. Milwaukee City R. Co. 27 Wis. 194, 9 Am. Rep. 461; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Rosedale Street R. 39 L. R. A.

Co. 64 Tex. 80, 58 Am. Rep. 739; Elliott v. Fair Haven & W. R. Co. 82 Conn. 579. These decisions rest upon the principle that the street was originally dedicated to the public for the purposes of travel thereon; that a car is a vehicle, the same as a coach or a wagon; and that the track of a street-railway company is laid upon a level with the surface of the street, and in such manner as not to obstruct the street, and prevent people from freely passing and repassing thereon. In other words, the horse car and its track is not a continued exclusive appropriation of any part of the street, to the continued exclusion of the rest of the public from that part of the street.

The city of Shawneetown, Illinois, built a levee in a street of that city for the purpose of protecting it against the overflow waters of the Ohio river. The levee was some 10 feet high, but so constructed that the top thereof could be used as the street had been. An abutting lotowner sued the city for damages, claiming that his lot had been depreciated in value by the presence in front of it of this levee, as it hindered his free ingress and egress to and from his property, and the supreme court of Illinois in Shawneetown v. Mason, 82 Ill. 337, 25 Am. Rep. 321, held that the levee was an additional burden, and the city liable.

The city authorities of East St. Louis, Illinois, authorized a bridge company, which owned a bridge across the Mississippi river at that point, to construct an approach to this bridge in a public street. An abutting lotowner sued the city for damages, claiming that the approach to the bridge interfered with his free ingress and egress to and from his property, and depreciated it in value; and the supreme court of Illinois in Stack v. East St. Louis, 85 Ill. 377, 28 Am. Rep. 619, held that the approach to the bridge was an additional burden, and the city liable for damages which its presence caused the abutting lotowner.

The city of New York prior to May, 1773, caused one of its engineers to survey and lay out into lots certain territory. Upon the plat the engineer left a space for streets. The conveyance made of these surveyed lots to the grantors of one Story contained a covenant that the grantees in such deed would "build and erect," at his own expense, certain streets, among others the streets on which Story's property fronted. The deed also declared that the streets marked on the survey or plat "shall forever thereafter continue and be for the free and common passage of, and as public streets and ways for the inhabitants of the said city, and all others passing and returning through or by the same, in such manner as the other streets of the same city now are or lawfully ought to be." Story became the owner of one of the lots so surveyed and marked out on said plat. The New York Elevated Railroad Company was about to construct in this street, under proper municipal and legislative authority, a trestle work 15 feet high. On this they were intending to lay tracks, and on these tracks operate passenger cars. Story sought to enjoin the railroad company from such use of the street until he should be awarded the damages which his property would sustain thereby. The case went to the court of appeals of New York, and is reported in Story v.

New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146. It was insisted by counsel for the railroad company that the construction and operation of the railroad as contemplated was within the purpose of the original grant or dedication of the land for the street, but the court of appeals held that the proposed railroad would impose an additional burden upon the easement; and the principle upon which it based its decision is that the trestle work would amount to a permanent and exclusive occupation of a portion of the street, to the continued exclusion of the public from such portion. To the same effect see Lahr v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 268.

It is quite generally held that an ordinary steam railroad in a city street or country highway constitutes an additional burden; and this is because the track of a steam railroad is of such a nature, and so constructed, that it exclusively and continuously occupies a portion of the street or highway, to the continuous exclusion of the rest of the public from such part of said street or highway. See, among others, Hastings & G. I. R. Co. v. Ingalls, 15 Neb. 123; Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Hartley, 67 Ill. 489, 16 Am. Rep. 624, and cases there cited.

Railroad cars are as much vehicles for the transportation of passengers, enabling the public to pass and repass from one part of the city or country to another, as are horse cars or carriages and buggies; but the rails of an ordinary railroad are laid upon ties, and these rest upon an elevation, and the roadbed is of such a nature and construction that it obstructs the street or highway in which it is placed, and debars the rest of the public from the use of that part of the street or highway occupied by its track.

It is also very generally held that telegraph and telephone poles in city streets or rural highways constitute additional burdens, entitling the abutting property owner to compensation. See, among others, the following cases so holding: Board of Trade Teleph. Co. v. Barnett, 107 Ill. 507, 47 Am. Rep. 453; Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. v. Mackenzie, 74 Md. 38; American Teleph. & Telegr. Co. v. Smith, 71 Md. 535, 7 L. R. A. 250; Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Williams, 86 Va. 696, 8 L. R. A. 429; Eels v. American Teleph. & Telegr. Co. 143 N. Y. 183, 25 L. R. A. 640.

The principle upon which all these cases rest is the sound one, that the highway or street is dedicated to the public for the purpose of enabling the public to pass and repass thereon, and that the erection of the poles in the streets by the telephone or telegraph companies is a permanent and exclusive occupation of the streets by such companies, to the continued exclusion of the remainder of the public, and in that sense the poles are a continued obstruction in the streets. The supreme court of Pennsylvania in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Montgomery County Pass. R. Co. 167 Pa. 63, 27 L. R. A. 766, held that an electric street railway, such as the one involved in this case, built in a public highway outside of the city, was an additional burden, entitling the adjacent landowner to damages.

We think that the poles and wires of the electric railway company are an additional servitude, or constitute an additional burden, 39 L. R. A.

upon the streets in which they are placed, and that the abutting lotowners of such streets are entitled to whatever damages their property has sustained by reason thereof.

2. Thus far we have considered this case with reference to the question as to whether the original dedication made of the street contemplated that the city might use or authorize the use of the streets for the purpose of placing poles and wires therein in connection with the operation of a railway. But our Constitution (art. 1, § 21) provides that the property of no person shall be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation. The writer is of opinion that if it be assumed that the original owner of this street, in dedicating it to the public, contemplated that it might be used for the erection of poles and wires therein, in connection with the operation of a passenger street railway, nevertheless if the city in applying the street to that use, or authorizing it to be so applied, damages the property of the adjacent owner, he is, by virtue of the Constitution, entitled to damages. This court, and nearly all other courts in which the state Constitution is like ours, has held that an abutting lotowner is entitled to compensation if his lot is depreciated in value by reason of the changing of the grade of the street in front of it. Now, when the land owner plats it into an addition to a city, and leaves a space for a street, he not only dedicates that space to the public for the purpose of a street, but he knows, or must know, that the municipality may work such street, keep it in repair, pave it, grade it, curb it, and may change the grade. And, where the courts have awarded damages to abutting lotowners because of a change in the grade of a street, it has not been upon the principle that such a change of grade was not contemplated at the time the grant was made, but it has been because of the constitutional inhibition that the public for its use shall not damage the citizens' property without compensation. Such is Elgin v. Eaton, 83 Ill. 535, 25 Am. Rep. 412. Most of the old Constitutions contained a provision that private property should not be taken for public use without just compensation, and it was quite generally held by the courts that this provision of the Constitution did not entitle an abutting lotowner to compensation for damages which his property had sustained by reason of a change of grade in the street. These cases rest upon the principle that a change of grade of a street was within the purview of the original grant of the land for the street. Suppose that A, owning a block in a city, shall deed one half of it to that city for any public purpose; by such a grant the city may devote that to any city purpose it may choose, and A could not be heard to say that the purpose to which the city had devoted the grant was not within it. But nevertheless, if the city, in the use it makes of the granted property, shall injure the remainder of A's property, it would be liable for the damages, because, in accepting the grant, it did so subject to the constitutional provision; and, though it might devote it to any public purpose it chose, yet if, in so doing, it damages A's property, or any other citizen's property, it must make good such damages. It seems to me, therefore, that, in order to enable the plaintiff in error in this case to recover damages from the street-railway company, it is not absolutely essential that the poles and wires of the street-railway company should be held, as a matter of law, to be an additional burden upon the easement.

3. The petition in this case alleges that the permanent existence in the street opposite this property of the poles and wires of the railway company interferes with the plaintiff's ingress and egress to and from her property, and have depreciated its value. Are these facts evidence competent to go to the jury for the determination of the question as to whether the plaintiff's property has been damaged, within the meaning of the Constitution just quoted?

In Gottschalk v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 14 Neb. 550, the railroad company constructed its tracks in an alley with the consent of the city authorities. The owner of the abutting lot sued the company for damages. The court, in speaking of the constitutional provision in reference to damage to property for public use, said: "The constitutional provision, therefore, is that private property shall not be taken or injuriously affected without just compensation therefor. The evident object of the amendment was to afford relief in certain cases where, under our former Constitution, none could be given. It was to grant relief in cases where there was no direct injury to the real estate itself, but some physical disturbance of a right which the owner possesses in connection with his estate, by reason of which he sustains special injury in respect to such property, in excess of that sustained by the public at large. To this extent the property owner is entitled to recover. It is not necessary, to entitle a party to recover, that there should be a direct physical injury to his property, if he has sustained damages in respect to the property itself, whereby its value has been permanently impaired and diminished."

In Omaha v. Kramer, 25 Neb. 489, it is said: "The words 'or damaged,' in § 21, art. 1, of the Constitution, include all damages resulting from the exercise of the right of eminent domain which diminish the market value of private property."

In Chicago, K. & N. R. Co. v. Hazels, 26 Neb. 364, the railway company took no part of Hazels' property, and no part of the street in front of his lot was occupied by the railway company's track, and yet the court held that, if Hazels' property was damaged because of the location of the tracks, he was entitled to recover.

In Omaha & N. P. R. Co. v. Janecek, 30 Neb. 276, Janecek sued the railroad company for damages which he alleged he had sustained by reason of the depreciation in value of his real estate as the result of the construction and operation of the railroad in front of his premises. Janecek owned block 16, and also a small tract of land lying immediately south thereof. His residence was on the west end of this small tract of land. West of block 16 and the small tract of land was Atlantic street, and west of this was block 15. The railroad company constructed its road through this latter block. No part of the railroad was on any part of Janecek's property, nor was any part of the railroad's property in the street on which his (Janecek's) property abutted. The court, speaking through Norval, J., said: "The plaintiff's right to recover is based upon § 21, art. 1, Constitution of this state, which provides that 'the property of no person shall be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation therefor.' It has become the settled law of this state that, under this provision of our Constitution, it is not necessary that any part of an individual's property should be actually taken for public use in order to entitle him to compensation. If the property has been depreciated in value by reason of the public improvement, which the owner has specially sustained, and which is not common to the public at large, a recovery may be had." To the same effect is Pekin v. Winkler, 77 Ill. 56; Slack v. East St. Louis, 85 Ill. 377, 28 Am. Rep. 619; Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64. In this last case Rigney recovered damages from the city of Chicago because it had permitted the construction of a viaduct over the intersection of Kinzie and Halsted streets, 200 feet west of Rigney's property. Rigney claimed that the construction of this viaduct cut off his communication with Halsted street, except by means of a pair of stairs at the intersection, and that because of this impairment of communication his real estate had been damaged. The supreme court said: "'Property,' in its appropriate sense, means that dominion or indefinite right of user and disposition which one may lawfully exercise over particular things or objects, and generally to the exclusion of all others, and doubtless this is substantially the sense in which the word is used in the Constitution, as to the taking or damaging of private property for the public use. But the word is often used to indicate the subject of the property or the thing owned. . . . That restriction of the remedy of the owners of private property to cases of actual physical injury to the property was under the Constitution of 1848 [art. 13, § 11], which simply provided that private property should not 'be taken or applied to public use' without just compensation, etc. The Constitution of 1870 [art. 2, § 13], however, provides that 'private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation,'—thus affording redress in cases not provided for by the Constitution of 1848, and embracing every case where there is a direct physical obstruction or injury to the right of user or enjoyment of private property, by which the owner sustains some special pecuniary damages in excess of that sustained by the public generally, which by the common law would, in the absence of any constitutional or statutory provision, give a right of action." Applying the principles enunciated in the foregoing cases to the facts of the case at bar, we are of opinion that, if Jaynes' property is depreciated in value by reason of the exclusive use of a part of the streets in front thereof by the railway company's poles and wires, and the continued presence in such streets of said poles and wires, she is entitled to compensation for such damages. As an abutting property owner, she has the right to free ingress and egress to and from this property and to and from the street; a right to an unobstructed view of the property from the street, and an unobstructed view of the street from the property; and if poles and wires of the railway company in the street in front of this property permanently and continuously infringe these rights, and she is damaged thereby, she is entitled to compensation therefor. If a railway company, without responsibility to the abutting lotowner, may build and maintain in the street one track, it may construct and maintain any number. If it may with impunity place and maintain in the street in front of the lotowner's property poles 50 feet apart, it may place them 5 feet apart, or closer, until the premises, with its poles and wires in front of it, will resemble the pictures one sees of the staked corral of the South African Zulu. Such a staking in of the premises would, of course, impair their value, and yet the difference in the case supposed and the one under consideration is one of degree only. This difference does not affect the owner's right of action, but goes only to the quantum of his damages.

What acts, omissions, facts, or circumstances are competent evidence of damages to be considered by a jury are questions of law for the court; but whether such acts, omissions, facts and circumstances affect an owner's property and damage it, and the amount of such damages, are for the jury.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to overrule the demurrer of the street-railway company, and permit it to answer.

Irvine, C., not sitting.

Ryan, C., concurring:

I desire to place my concurrence in the result in this case on grounds rather more limited than those above given. In this case a general demurrer was sustained to the petition, upon which, the plaintiff having elected to stand, there was a judgment for the defendant. The demurrer, for present purposes, must be assumed to have admitted such facts as were well pleaded, and it therefore is necessary that the averments of the petition should be stated with more than ordinary fullness. The defendant was described as a corporation engaged in the maintenance, construction, and operation of street railways in the city of Omaha, and was described as the successor of another street-railway company in rights and liabilities with respect to the street railway along plaintiff's premises, hereinafter more particularly described. The condition of the streets affected, and their appropriation and use by the predecessor of the defendant, as well as by the defendant itself, were described in the petition in this language: "That said lot [owned by plaintiff] is a strip of ground two hundred and forty feet in length east and west, and sixty feet in width north and south, bounded on the east by Sixteenth street, on the south by Clark street, in the city of Omaha; that said Sixteenth street east of said premises, and Clark street south of said premises, at the time of the happening of the grievances hereinafter complained of, were, and for a long time prior thereto had been, public streets of said city of Omaha, but not occupied, used, or obstructed by steam, electric, or horse railways in any manner whatever; that on or about the 1st day of September, 1889, a corporation known as the 'Omaha Motor Railway Company,' constructed a line of street railway over and upon Clark street, immediately south of said premises, and over and upon Sixteenth street, immediately east of said premises, and commenced the operation of said line of railway over and upon said streets adjacent to said premises, the motive power used upon said street railway at the time of the construction thereof being electricity, poles, for the purpose of supporting overhead wires being set in the ground along said streets, and adjacent to said premises, and overhead wires being attached thereto along said streets adjoining said premises. Plaintiff further says that ever since the construction of said street railway the same has been operated as an electric street railway, cars and motors passing over the line of said railway immediately adjacent to said premises, and over Clark street immediately south of said premises, and Sixteenth street immediately east of said premises, at intervals of about five minutes. Plaintiff further says that by reason of the location, construction, and operation of said line of street railway over and upon Clark street immediately south of said premises, and over and upon Sixteenth street immediately east of said premises and adjacent thereto, said premises have been greatly depreciated, the location of the tracks, poles, and wires of said street railway upon said Clark and Sixteenth streets, as hereinafter described, greatly interfering with the egress from, and ingress to, said premises from said streets, and obstructing the view from said premises looking towards said streets, the passage of trains over said street railway upon said streets in front of and adjacent to said premises also greatly interfering with the ingress to, and egress from, said premises, rendering the same difficult and dangerous, and the noise and vibration incident to the use of said tracks by said defendant company greatly interfering with the comfort and convenience of persons occupying said premises, said premises having been lessened and depreciated in value on account of the construction and operation of said street railway in the sum of twenty thousand dollars." The facts upon which the plaintiff predicates his right of recovery are the taking possession of, and the using for a street railway operated by electricity of, two streets adjacent to his property. The first class of the element of damages claimed refer to the effect of locating the tracks, poles, and wires as obstructions to ingress and egress and, of the view from the premises of plaintiff looking towards the street. The other elements are the passage of trains over the track, interfering with, and rendering dangerous, egress from, and ingress to, plaintiff's premises, and the noise and vibration incident to the use of the tracks, which interfere with the comfort and convenience of persons occupying said premises. In respect to the last two, it may be said that it is now the settled doctrine in this country that an ordinary street railway, upon which cars are moved by horse power, is not an additional burden. Citizens' Coach Co. v. Camden Horse R. Co. 38 N. J. Eq. 287, 36 Am. Rep. 542; Hobart v. Milwaukee City R. Co. 27 Wis. 194, 9 Am. Rep. 464; Carson v. Central R. Co. 35 Cal. 325; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Rosedale Street R. Co. 64 Tex. 80, 58 Am. Rep. 739; Elliott v. Fair Haven & W. R. Co. 82 Conn. 579; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. West Chicago Street R. Co. 156 Ill. 255, 29 L. R. A. 485; Merrick v. Intramontaine R. Co. 118 N. C. 1081.

For the occupation and use of the street for ordinary street-railway purposes, it must, I think, be conceded that the defendant was not liable to plaintiff in damages upon the authority of these cases; hence I omit the allegations as to the occupation and use of the street by a track, for it is common to all street railways, whether operated by horse power or electricity. I shall now consider the respect in which the petition charges that the defendant's use of the street differed from that of an ordinary street railway operated by horse power, and in what respects this different user has caused damages to be suffered by the plaintiff. These factors we have already grouped under the first class of elements of damages, and they are the locating of poles and wires which obstruct ingress and egress, and interfere with view from plaintiff's premises across the street. The manner in which real property may be injuriously affected, without being physically disturbed or entered upon, is well illustrated by the following adjudicated cases: The city of Shawneetown, Illinois, built a levee in a street of that city for the purpose of protecting it against the overflow waters of the Ohio river. The levee was about 10 feet high, but was so constructed that its upper surface could be used as the street had been before the construction of said levee. An abutting lotowner sued the city for damages, claiming that his lot had been depreciated in value by the presence in front of it of this levee, for the reason that it hindered his free ingress and egress to and from his property, and the supreme court of Illinois held the city liable. Shawneetown

v. Mason, 82 Ill. 387, 25 Am. Rep. 321. The construction of the approaches to a bridge in such a manner as to obstruct the ingress and egress of an owner to and from his property was held to be such an injury as entitled such owner to maintain an action for damages. Stack v. East St. Louis, 85 Ill. 377, 28 Am. Rep. 619. In Merrick v. Intramontaine R. Co. 118 N. C. 1081, it was said by Faircloth, Ch. J., delivering the opinion of the supreme court of North Carolina: "If the street railway should be so constructed,—for instance, if it should shut out or shut off the abutter with embankments, and thus materially impair his rights,—this would seem to be an additional burden, and subject the company to damages." These adjudicated cases serve to illustrate the fact that in plaintiff's petition the averments that the location of the poles and wires of the street railway upon Clark and Sixteenth streets, in such a way as to interfere with plaintiff's ingress and egress, and his view from his premises towards said streets, in connection with the allegation that thereby his real property had suffered depreciation in value, sufficiently stated a cause of action, in view of § 21, art. 1, of the Constitution of this state, which is as follows: "The property of no person shall be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation therefor." As further illustrating the applicability and purpose of this constitutional provision, see also Gottschalk v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 14 Neb. 550; Omaha v. Kramer, 25 Neb. 489; Chicago, K. & N. R. Co. v. Hazels, 26 Neb. 364; and Omaha & N. P. R. Co. v. Janacek, 30 Neb. 276.

I have considered this case as it was presented by the averments of the petition, which the demurrer admitted to be true, and, tested by the requirements of liberal construction laid down in Roberts v. Sampson, 50 Neb. 745, there was stated a cause of action. If there exist facts which should serve to change or modify our views, these facts, I think should be pleaded by the defendant, for we cannot assume their existence. For the reasons above stated I concur in the conclusion. The judgment of the district court should be reversed.

The loss of the hats of persons attending a club banquet on the invitation and at the expense of the club, which had a contract to pay a specified sum for each plate furnished, where they left their hats on the rack as they entered the dining room of a hotel and they were taken without the negligence or fault of the innkeeper or his employees, does not render him liable, although such persons had registered and been assigned a room in the inn.

ACTIONS to hold defendant, an innkeeper, responsible for the loss of hats taken from the rack at the door of the dining room. Judgment for defendant.

Defendant, an innkeeper, on the evening of January 8, 1895, provided in his dining room a banquet for a club which agreed to pay a specified sum for each plate furnished. Plaintiffs were not members of the club but were invited by it to be present at the banquet as guests. They went to the hotel and registered and were assigned a room which they occupied. Upon going into the banqueting room they left their hats upon a rack provided for guests at the door. Before the banquet was closed they repaired to their rooms where they remained some time and upon returning found the banquet ended, the doors closed, and their hats missing. They remained in the hotel until morning when they demanded their hats of defendant and upon his refusal to produce them, this action was brought.

Messrs. Drew, Jordan, & Buckley for plaintiffs.

Mr. Isaac L. Heath, for defendant:

The plaintiffs were not guests of the hotel, — in so far as they were acting at the time the loss occurred, though they had registered and been assigned a room, they were no more the guests of the hotel than if the loss had happened at the banquet hall in Pembroke Block adjoining.

Carter v. Hobbs, 12 Mich. 52.

Plaintiffs were not guests as to the banquet where the loss occurred, and defendant cannot be held as bailee, as the case finds there was no negligence on his part.

Ingaldees v. Wood, 36 Barb. 452; Mowers v. Fethers, 61 N. Y. 34, 19 Am. Rep. 244.

The plaintiffs retained the exclusive control of the property lost. They did not put it in the care of the defendant, nor did they request him to take charge of it. However it might have been had they placed the hats upon the rack in question during a hotel meal for which they paid, the placing them there while at this banquet for the payment of which they were not liable, was not putting them in the care of the defendant as an innkeeper, any more than had they gone into the barber shop and hung them up while being shaved.

Albin v. Presby, 8 N. H. 408, 29 Am. Dec. 679; Fuller v. Coats, 18 Ohio St. 343.

The loss occurred by reason of the want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiffs. Going out from the banquet, having completed their repast, they left their hats, with some hundred others, for two hours in the middle of the night, while they went to their room; during this time the banquet ended and the participants departed, taking their hats and coats from the rack in question.

Negligence on the part of the guest, or want of ordinary care, exonerates the innkeeper from liability for loss.

Messrs. Ladd & Fletcher also for defendant.

Blodgett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

To subject the defendant to liability as innkeeper, it must appear, not only that the plaintiffs' goods were lost at his inn, but that he was acting in the capacity of innkeeper when the goods were lost, and that the plaintiffs were his guests; or, in other words, that the plaintiffs were at the inn for purposes which the common law recognizes as the purposes for which inns are kept, namely, the accommodation and entertainment of travelers and way-faring men, and not for those who may be there for some special purpose not connected with passage or travel. Calye's Case, 8 Coke, 32a, and note, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. *181; Carter v. Hobbs, 12 Mich. 52, 83 Am. Dec. 762; Fitch v. Casler, 17 Hun, 126; Gastenhofer v. Clair, 10 Daly, 265, 266; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 20, 21; McDaniels v. Robinson (Vt.) 62 Am. Dec. 590, note.

Upon the facts as reported, we think the rigorous rule that makes the landlord of an inn responsible for the goods of his guests under almost all circumstances, and without proof of negligence or fault on his part or of those in his employ, cannot be extended so as to protect the plaintiffs, for, as to the banquet where the loss occurred, and which they attended on the invitation and at the expense of the club, the plaintiffs are justly to be regarded as its guests, and not of the defendant, as innkeeper or otherwise, who simply provided the banquet as caterer under a contract with the club, without any lien or claim for compensation against its guests, and with no right or power to exclude anybody from participating in its festivities whom the club might properly invite. Neither by contract nor by operation of law was the defendant acting in the character of innkeeper as to the club, and still less as to its guests, who would have had no right whatever to attend except upon its invitation. Both the club and its guests came, not as ordinary travelers to an inn, but as to a banquet, for the purpose of participating in and enjoying its festivities. And likewise as to both the fact that the defendant chanced to be keeping an inn, and served the banquet there, makes his liability no greater than that of any other person not an innkeeper, who might have taken and executed the contract, either at the inn or elsewhere. One may be an innkeeper without being a club caterer, or he may be a club caterer without being an innkeeper, or he may be both; but, if he is, the two employments are so far separate and distinct in respect of duties and liabilities as not to make him responsible in the one capacity for liabilities incurred in the other. See Minor v. Staples, 71 Me. 316, 36 Am. Rep. 318. Nor does the fact that the plaintiffs had registered, and been assigned a room in the inn, affect the legal status of either party. As to the banquet where the loss occurred, "which was not furnished to the guests of the house, and was not one of the meals provided for them," the plaintiffs' registration and assignment put them in no different position, in a legal sense, than they would have occupied if they had registered and obtained a room elsewhere, or if the defendant had served the banquet at some place separate from and disconnected with his inn. Not having lost their property at the defendant's inn in the character of guests, but in the execution of a purpose distinct from their accommodation as guests, the plaintiffs' actions are not maintainable. Authorities supra. Other grounds of defense need not be considered.

Judgment for the defendant.

Carpenter, J., did not sit. The others concur.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

Lazar STERNBERG et al.

v.

David WOLFF et al.

(.....N. J.)

1. An injunction against the plaintiff may be imposed as a condition of a similar injunction in his favor against the defendant limiting their power to make promissory notes or checks for a corporation of which they are directors and officers and the affairs of which have come to a deadlock by dissensions between two factions, each of which owns one half of the capital stock.

2. A receiver of a trading corporation may be appointed, pending litigation, over the management and conduct of its business, when its affairs have come to a deadlock because of dissensions between two families each of which owns one half of the capital stock.

(Collins, J., dissents.)

(January 29, 1898.)

CCROSS-APPEALS from an order of the Chancery Court in a suit to enjoin defendant Wolff from exercising authority as treasurer of a trading corporation; the defendants appealing from so much of the order as allowed the injunction, and complainants appealing from so much as imposed a like injunction on the other members of the concern. Orders vacated.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert H. Carter, for complainants:

The order enjoining Mr. Sternberg was irregular, improper, and illegal, and should be reversed.

Before this injunction, involving as it does moral turpitude in the executive of this company, should have issued, he should have been allowed to have put in his defense, when there was no occasion whatever for immediate intervention and not the slightest suggestion that the company or its stockholders would suffer by affording him that ordinary but essential privilege.

High, Inj. § 1579; Citizens' Coach Co. v. Camden Horse R. Co. 29 N. J. Eq. 299.

The order for the injunction against Sternberg was broader than prayed for in the cross bill.

When a complainant desires so heroic a remedy he must not only show by plain proof a sufficient case of urgency, but he must, in his bill or petition, specifically pray for the exact injunction he desires.

African M. E. Church v. Conover, 27 N. J. Eq. 157; Savory v. Dyer, 1 Ambl. 70; Munro v. Wivenhoe & B. R. Co. 4 De G. J. & S. 723; Burdett v. Hay, 9 Jur. N. S. 1260, 4 De G. J. & S. 40; Story, Eq. Pl. § 48; 1 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 6th Am. ed. *388.

It was not based on proofs of acts either committed or anticipated, but allowed simply because it would do no harm.

Kerr, Inj. *30; Coffin v. Coffin, Jac. 72; High, Inj. § 655; Crockett v. Crockett, 2 Ohio St. 187.

Nor can this injunction be maintained on the ground that it was a term or condition of the allowance of Sternberg's injunction against Wolff.

The ordinary condition precedent to the granting of preliminary injunctions is the requirement that the complainant give bonds to answer in damages.

Chappell v. Davidson, 8 De G. M. & G. 2; Kerr, Inj. p. 625; Chetwood v. Brittan, 2 N. J. Eq. 438; Murray v. Elston, 28 N. J. Eq. 127.

The injunction against Wolff was proper and should be continued.

The acts complained of are all ultra vires his duties as treasurer, and there can be no question, inasmuch as his wife expressly ratifies all his acts, and adopts them as her own. But that it would have been futile to have undertaken to secure corporate action in the premises, as the presence of both Wolffs and the vote of one of them would have been essential.

Under such circumstances one or more stockholders may interfere to protect his property.

Cook, Stock & Stockholders, §§ 645, 741; Hawes v. Contra Costa Water Co. (Hawes v. Oakland), 104 U. S. 450, 26 L. ed. 827; Fougeray v. Cord, 50 N. J. Eq. 185, affirmed on this point, Laurel Springs Land Co. v. Fougeray, 50 N. J. Eq. 758; 4 Thomp. Corp. §§ 4578, 4504; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 242, 253, 254, 282, 525; Brown v. Vanduyke, 8 N. J. Eq. 795, 55 Am. Dec. 250.

Mr. Louis Hood also for complainants.
Messrs. Riker & Riker and Charles D. Thompson for defendants.

Depue, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 25th of July, 1893, Sternberg, Wolff, and Misch became incorporated under the general corporation act, under the name of L. Sternberg & Co., with a capital stock of $100,000, divided into 1,000 shares, the par value of which was $100 each. The object for which this company was incorporated was to carry on a general merchandise business. At a meeting of the stockholders, on the 26th of August, 1897, Sternberg was the owner of 499 shares; Rosa Sternberg, his wife, of 1 share; David Wolff, 1 share; and Rosa Wolff, his wife, 499 shares,—the situation being that one half of the capital stock was held by Sternberg and his wife, and the other half by Wolff and his wife. At this meeting the by-laws were amended so that the board of directors should consist of four members, and the whole number of directors should be necessary to a quorum, and the four persons above named were elected directors. Lazar Sternberg was elected president, David Wolff being secretary and treasurer. Among the by-laws was the provision that Lazar Sternberg and David Wolff and Henry Kern, the general superintendent, should not be subject to discharge or reduction of salary by any officer of the company or by the board of directors without the consent in writing of the majority in interest of the stockholders; that other employees might be discharged either by Lazar Sternberg or David Wolff, and new employees should be employed only with the concurrence of both Lazar Sternberg and David Wolff, unless otherwise ordered by the board of directors. It is unnecessary to go into particulars. It is sufficient to say that after the meeting last referred to, Sternberg and his wife, as the one party, were the owners of one half of the capital stock of the company, and Wolff and his wife the owners of the other half. Difficulties and dissensions arose between these four persons, in which Sternberg and his wife, the one half in number of the board of directors, were engaged on the one side, and Wolff and his wife, the other half of the board of directors, were engaged on the other side. By reason of these dissensions, the management of the business by the board of directors was in a deadlock, although the company was largely engaged in the conduct of the business for which it was incorporated. In consequence of the disputes between these parties, in October, 1897, Sternberg and his wife filed a bill in the court of chancery against Wolff, to restrain him, among other things, from exercising the duties of treasurer, and from discharging employees or interfering with the regular business of the company for his own personal ends, with a further prayer that, if necessary, a receiver might be appointed to take charge of said company, and manage the same, pending the decision of this suit. No answer had been filed by Wolff when the hearing on this application was had before the vice chancellor; but Wolff, in his affidavit, states that he believes that the safety of the business demands the appointment of a receiver at least during the pendency of the litigation, and until an adjustment of the interests of the stockholders can be arrived at. Rosa Wolff was not a party to the bill, but she made an affidavit stating that she was the owner of half of the company's stock, and claiming that it was necessary for the protection of her interests that a receiver should be appointed for the corporation at least during the pendency of this litigation, and until the rights and powers of the officers and stockholders of the company shall have been adjusted and fixed under the order of the court.

This matter coming on for hearing before the vice chancellor on bill, affidavits, and counter affidavits, the vice chancellor advised an order dated November 6, 1897, denying the application for a receiver, but ordering that pending this suit an injunction do issue, enjoining David Wolff, the defendant herein, from drawing any promissory notes or checks of the company or on behalf thereof, except for ascertained debts due by the said company, or from drawing any check to the order of himself, except for salary due him after deducting all charges against him for rent and goods, the disputed items of $206 and $140 for banquet and stable account, respectively, not to be included in the ascertainment of said charges against him, the same being reserved until the final hearing of the case, and from discharging employees, except for cause, and that by the permission of the court, or from employing any new employees without the permission of the court, and from making or procuring to be made any list of the customers of said company, and from continuing to act as treasurer of the said company unless within ten days from the date hereof he should file a bond in the penal sum of $20,000 conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties as treasurer of the defendant corporation; and that the complainant Lazar Sternberg be likewise enjoined from drawing any promissory notes or checks of the company, or on behalf thereof, except for ascertained debts due by the said company, or from drawing any check to the order of himself except for salary due him after deducting all charges against him for rent and goods; and from discharging employees except for cause, by the permission of the court, or from employing any new employees without the permission of the court, and from making or procuring to be made any list of the customers of said company, and from inducing the employees of the company to fail to pay proper respect to the defendant and other officers of the company, and from inducing them to refuse obedience to their orders.

The vice chancellor in granting the injunction against Sternberg seems to have gone upon the ground that the mutuality of the injunction was necessary to protect the interests of all the stockholders in the affairs of the company pendente lite. It is within the power of the court of chancery, in granting to a suitor an injunction to impose terms; and I have no doubt that the terms imposed in this case were such as it was in the power of the court to impose, enjoining a defendant on the terms that an injunction relating to the same subject-matter should go against the complainant. The business of the company, at the time these orders were made, in manufacturing and selling clothing, was very large, the company having their main place of business in the city of Newark, and eleven branches located elsewhere in the state; and it is undeniable that the pendency of these injunction orders seriously interferes with the business of the company; and, in the judgment of this court, it is wholly impracticable for the court of chancery to take upon itself the control of the details of the business of this company in conformity with this injunction, as well as quite impossible that the business of the company should be profitably carried on without those who are engaged in the management of the business being allowed to manage and conduct the same upon business methods rather than by the methods proposed by these injunction orders. But it is apparent from the facts that appear in the bill, and affidavits that some relief pending this litigation should be afforded in these proceedings. The two parties to the controversy—Sternberg and his wife on the one side, and Wolf and his wife on the other side—are the owners each of one half of the capital stock. These four individuals are directors of the company, and by the by-laws the whole number is necessary to make a quorum for the transaction of business. The dissensions between these two parties—Sternberg and his wife on one side, and Wolf and his wife on the other side—have brought the affairs of this company to a deadlock, so far as any corporate action by the board of directors is concerned. It may be assumed that the court of chancery has no jurisdiction to dissolve a solvent corporation, and distribute its assets, on the ground that the business of the corporation is improperly conducted by its board of directors, even though such mismanagement be with the concurrence of a majority of the stockholders; but the jurisdiction of the court of chancery to control the business of a company, especially a trading company, pending a litigation over the management and conduct of its business, must necessarily exist; and we think, pending a litigation such as that which is inaugurated by the proceedings in this case, a receiver may be appointed. Corporations such as the one now before us are mere trading companies with a corporate organization, for the convenience of conducting the business for which they were incorporated. Such a corporation has not the qualities of corporations created for public purposes. No reason appears why in the matter of the control and conduct of its business the corporation and its officers should not be within the control of the court of chancery to an extent corresponding with the control of that court over the business of a mere partnership.

The cases seem to establish the power of the court in virtue of its general jurisdiction to preserve the subject of litigation pendente lite, though it may relate to the affairs of a trading company in form organized as a corporation. The two cases cited by the vice chancellor in his second opinion are to that effect. Featherstone v. Cooke, L. R. 16 Eq. 298; Trade Auxiliary Co. v. Vickers, L. R. 16 Eq. 303. In the first case the complications in the affairs of the company arose out of a division in the board of directors, which made it absolutely impossible that the affairs of the company could be conducted with advantage. Vice Chancellor Mallins in that case says: "With regard to private partnerships, nothing is of more frequent occurrence than the quarrels of partners. If partners quarrel, oust each other from the management, or so conduct themselves that the partnership cannot go on with advantage, it is every day's practice for the court to interfere by injunction, and appoint a receiver if necessary. With regard to public companies, I apprehend the same principle is applicable. If a state of things exists in which the governing body are so divided that they cannot act together, and there is the same kind of feeling between the members as there is frequently in the case of private partnerships, it is clearly within the rule of this court to interfere, and it will do so." The court in that case intervened by injunction and receiver simply to protect the property of the company, to continue, however, no longer than until a governing body was duly appointed. In the latter case the dissension was also in the board of directors one set of which closed the office doors of the company's building, and the other set, with the aid of some laborers, broke open the doors with crowbars, and forced the office open. The prayer of the bill was for the appointment of a receiver until the proper board of directors was constituted. The vice chancellor placed the affairs of the company in the hands of a receiver pendente lite until a new governing body was appointed. The vice chancellor's opinion states the principle to be that the court will not interfere with the internal affairs of joint stock companies unless they are in a condition in which there is no properly constituted governing body, or there are such dissensions in the governing body that it is impossible to carry on the business with advantage to the parties interested. In such a case the court will interfere, but only for a limited time and to as small an extent as possible. Chancellor Runyon, in Einstein v. Rosenfeld, 88 N. J. Eq. 809, after citing the two cases already cited, did not dissent from the ruling of the vice chancellor in those cases. He denied the appointment of a receiver on the ground that the business of the company was being carried on, and that there was no need of immediate interference on the part of the court for the protection of the property or business interests of the company. In Archer v. American Waterworks Co., 50 N. J. Eq. 33, the present chancellor, after referring to the three cases above cited, said that "if the present directors of the company . . . continue their dissensions, so that the affairs of the company are not speedily attended to, upon a proper application I will care for the property, pending determination of the suit, through the instrumentality of a receiver. Such action will be supported by precedents and authority. . . . My interference, however, by injunction and receiver will be limited to the imperative requirements of the present emergency." In an earlier case Vice Chancellor Van Fleet said: "The power of this court to appoint a receiver of a corporation, either because it has no properly constituted governing body, or because there are such dissensions in its governing body as to make it impossible for the corporation to carry on its business with advantage to its stockholders, I think must be regarded as settled; but I think it is equally well settled that this power is subject to certain limitations, namely, it must always be exercised with great caution, and only for such time and to such an extent as may be necessary to preserve the property of the corporation and protect the rights and interests of its stockholders." Edison v. Edison United Phonograph Co. 52 N. J. Eq. 620, 625, 626. In Fougeray v. Cord, 50 N. J. Eq. 185, 756, this court did not deny the power of the court of chancery to appoint a receiver pendente lite for the management of the affairs of an incorporated company organized for the purpose of trade. The ruling of this court was that "the disturbance of corporate functions incident to a receivership are extreme powers and may not be decreed by a court of equity when the specific acts complained of are capable of redress and complete restitution and those apprehended fall within the ordinary jurisdiction by injunction." The order of the court of chancery appointing a receiver in that case was set aside by this court, not on the ground of a want of power in the court of chancery to resort to the proposed mode of relief, but on the ground that, in the judgment of this court, that power was in that instance improperly exercised.

That some redress should have been afforded under the bill filed in this case is apparent from the facts disclosed in the bill and affidavits. That the vice chancellor granted injunctions which so completely interfered with the affairs of the company as to make the conduct of its business by its officers in ordinary business methods impossible, and assumed the administration of its business affairs to such an extent as to be utterly impracticable, affords a convincing argument for such relief as is practicable through the intervention of the court of chancery under the circumstances. Such relief, we think, could be afforded only by the appointment of a receiver pendente lite.

On both appeals the injunction orders should be vacated, and the record should be remitted to the Court of Chancery, to be proceeded with in accordance with these views.

Collins, J., dissenting (Filed January 31, 1898):

While I agree with the majority of this court that the situation disclosed by the affidavits called for the appointment of a receiver on the application of either party, I also think that pending such appointment it was justifiable, under the affidavits, to order an injunction forbidding David Wolff to further act as treasurer of the corporation until he should give bonds, and restraining him from making such drafts and notes as were interdicted. Such an order might justly have been made conditional upon submission by Lazar Sternberg to like interdiction. A modified injunction of this tenor seems still unobjectionable, and may be necessary.

v.

OHIO OIL COMPANY.

(.....Ohio.....)

- *1. Petroleum oil is a mineral, and while it is in the earth it forms a part of the realty, and when it reaches a well, and is produced on the surface, it becomes personal property, and belongs to the owner of the well.
2. Whether such oil percolates through the rock, or exists in pools or deposits, it forms a part of that tract of real estate in which it tarries for the time being; and when it leaves one tract, and enters another, it becomes a part of the realty of the latter, and thereby the owner of the former loses all right to the oil while it remains away from his land.
3. The drilling of wells by each owner of adjoining oil lands, along and near the division line, so that each may obtain the amount of oil contained in his lands, is known as "protecting lines," and such protection affords a certain and ample remedy to prevent one operator from obtaining more than his share of oil.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hancock County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to enjoin the drilling of certain oil wells. Affirmed.

Statement by Burket, Ch. J.:

The plaintiff in error was plaintiff below. The cause came on for hearing in the circuit court on appeal, upon the following petition and supplemental petition: "The defendant is a corporation found and organized under the laws of Ohio. One John F. Hastings, of Findlay, in said county, is owner in fee, seised and possessed of 165 acres of valuable mineral oil land in Findlay, Ohio, and more particularly designated as the west half of the northwest quarter of section No. 1, and the east half of the northeast quarter of section No. 2, in township one north, range ten east; and that plaintiff has a contract and agreement with said Hastings whereby plaintiff has the right to operate said lands for oil, and take the oil from said land, yielding to said Hastings a portion or royalty of the oil so produced, the balance to be retained by plaintiff as his own property; and in virtue of said contract plaintiff is now at work on said land, has two wells completed, and a rig up and ready to begin the drilling of a third well thereon. That said Hastings's land is joined on the east and west by lands now in the possession and control for oil purposes of the defendant, on which they now have producing oil wells; and the east 80 acres of said Hastings's farm is joined on the south by mineral oil lands owned in fee by the said defendant, and on which also the defendant has producing oil wells. That underlying the land of said Hastings, and the lands so adjoining the same on the south and west and east, as aforesaid, is a formation of porous sand or Trenton rock, so called, which is permeated with valuable mineral oil. That the nature of said mineral oil deposit is such that when, in the process of operating, an oil well is drilled from the surface down into and through said oil-bearing rock, and the usual pumping appliances attached to and employed on said well to extract oil therein, the oil will be drawn to said opening from a long distance through said porous rock, and all the oil within a radius of from 200 to 250 feet surrounding such well will be drawn to and extracted by means of such well, so that in order to drain and exhaust all the oil in the land it is only necessary to drill the wells from 400 to 500 feet apart. The defendants, well knowing the premises, and designing wilfully and unlawfully to extract the mineral oil from, in, and under the said Hastings land, by means of surface operations on the land so owned and controlled by them, in fraud and violation of the plaintiff's right, and from motives of un-mixed malice, have located a line of oil wells along the entire east line of said farm, and upon and along the said south line of the east 80 acres of said farm, which wells are so located just 25 feet from the line of Hastings's land, and just 400 feet apart, all of which wells so located the defendants threaten and intend to drill at once, with the design and to the unlawful intent and purpose aforesaid. That, in view of the well-known tendency of said wells to drain a large extent of territory immediately surrounding them, it is the custom and almost universal practice of oil operators when operating adjoining lands, to locate their wells at least 200 feet from the line of lands, in order that, so far as reasonably practicable, each operator's well shall draw its supply from his own land, and not unnecessarily disturb or detract from the oil mineral wealth of the adjoining lands. That the defendants' holdings on the east consist of about 160 acres in a body, and on the south a very large tract, to wit, several hundred acres, and there is in the defendants' operating said land for oil no sort of necessity or excuse for the defendants to locate their said wells so unusually near the Hastings line, as there are no wells at all on the Hastings east or south line, except the wells operated by the defendant, which are more than 200 feet from the defendant's line, and by plaintiff's contract with Hastings, which is of record well known to the defendant, no well is to be drilled by the plaintiff within 200 feet of the exterior line of the farm, unless it becomes necessary in order to protect the line; so that the only motive of the defendant in so locating its said wells was to injure the plaintiff, and to get the oil which would be available to him in his operation of said farm. If the defendants are permitted to extract the plaintiff's oil in the manner as aforesaid, the plaintiff will suffer irreparable injury, and will have no adequate legal remedy, for the reason that it will be impossible to determine the exact proportion of the product belonging to the plaintiff. Wherefore the plaintiff prays that a temporary restraining order issue, enjoining the defendant from drilling and operating any oil well at any point within 200 feet of the line of said Hastings farm, unless it should become necessary to approach nearer in order to protect the line and that on the final hearing that said injunction be made perpetual."

"And now comes the plaintiff, by leave of this court, and for a supplemental petition and in addition to the allegations of the original petition, alleges that, since the dissolution of the temporary injunction granted in this action, the defendants have proceeded and located and drilled, and are now operating for oil, or about to begin operating twelve oil wells, nine of which are at the points stated in the petition, and three of which are on the Reimund farm, adjoining the Hastings farm on the west,—all of which wells are so completed and operating by means of pumping appliances, and all which wells are so operating about 25 feet from the lines of said farm. That all of said wells are oil-producing wells of greater or less capacity, and that by means thereof the defendants are daily extracting large and valuable quantities of mineral oil, a large part of which mineral oil is so drawn and extracted from the deposits thereof in the land of said Hastings, and which oil the plaintiff has, by his contract with said Hastings, the right to take and use and enjoy. The said wells draw their supply so indiscriminately from the mines and lands of said Hastings and of the defendant that it is impossible to distinguish that of the defendant from that of the plaintiff, but all of said oil is so being taken by the said defendant and converted to its own use. Wherefore, in addition to the prayer of the petition, the plaintiff prays that the defendant be required to account to the plaintiff for the oil so taken; that the amount thereof be ascertained; and that the plaintiff may have a decree and judgment against the defendant therefor, and for all proper relief."

The circuit court was of opinion that the petition and supplemental petition failed to state a cause of action against the oil company and therefore refused to hear any evidence, and found from the pleadings in favor of the defendant, to which plaintiff excepted.

Mr. George H. Phelps, for plaintiff in error:

It is manifestly wrong for the owner of adjoining land to secure the oil which is the property of his neighbor.

Equity will not suffer a wrong without a remedy.

1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 428.

Mineral oil is as fixed and stable in the porous rock to which it is indigenous as coal or any solid mineral, and has no natural tendency to escape until it is disturbed by artificial means peculiarly adapted to securing and utilizing it, and it would never go across the line of the land of its owner unless deprived of lateral support sufficient, in nature, to maintain it in situ.

Ohio State Geological Sur. of 1890, p. 84.

This right to lateral support is as sacred as any other right incident to the land, and as much under the protection of the law.

The fact that such property is in its nature more susceptible to injury by the oil operations of the adjoining land increases rather than diminishes the degree of care and caution required of the adjoining proprietor in the use of his land for such special purpose, and a bad custom or habit of crowding lines cannot avail as an excuse for such obvious wrong to the adjoining proprietor.

Horner v. Watson, 79 Pa. 242, 21 Am. Rep. 55; Columbus & H. Coal & I. Co. v. Tucker, 48 Ohio St. 60.

The right of man to take water is a usufructory, as contradistinguished from a property, right.

Lembeck v. Nye, 47 Ohio St. 386, 8 L. R. A. 576.

Petroleum or rock oil is a mineral substance in solution; in place it is a mine underlying the land having in a state of nature, unmolested by mining operations, no migratory tendency whatever, and operations designed solely for securing such mineral are essentially and distinctly mining operations, and such oil when brought to the surface is a recognized commercial commodity.

16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 221, and note.

Plaintiff and defendant must be regarded as the owners and operators of adjoining mines.

Theirs is not an ordinary use of the land, but a special and unusual one, and their correlative rights and duties in respect to such use are peculiarly those of adjoining mine owners, and not those of adjoining landowners in the general and ordinary sense in which those terms are used and known in the law.

The only injury to which an adjoining owner of landed property is compelled to submit is that which is fairly incident to the use of the adjoining property for the purpose of the ordinary usual uses to which landed property is applied.

The owner of land shall so use his own as not unnecessarily to injure the property rights of the adjoining owner.

Defendant in the exercise of its right to mine the adjoining lands for oil shall respect the plaintiff's equal right on the Hastings land, and while in its mining operations it may employ all the usual known and practical means for securing the oil deposits in its own mine, it must at the same time employ the same means to prevent encroachment upon and injury to the mineral rights of the plaintiff.

carefully and faithfully observed then any incidental injury resulting to either party by the operations of the other would, under the law, be damnum absque injuria.

Messrs. John Poe and James O. Troup for defendant in error.

Burket, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question is not as to the motive—fraud or malice—which may have induced the oil company to drill the wells sought to be enjoined. The only question of practical importance is, 'Had the oil company the legal right to drill the wells? When a person has the legal right to do a certain act, the motive with which it is done is immaterial. The right to acquire, enjoy, and own property carries with it the right to use it as the owner pleases, so long as such use does not interfere with the legal rights of others. To drill an oil well near the line of one's land cannot interfere with the legal rights of the owner of the adjoining lands, so long as all operations are confined to the lands upon which the well is drilled. Whatever gets into the well belongs to the owner of the well, no matter where it came from. In such cases the well and its contents belong to the owner or lessee of the land, and no one can tell to a certainty from whence the oil, gas, or water which enters the well came, and no legal right as to the same can be established or enforced by an adjoining landowner. The right to drill and produce oil on one's own land is absolute, and cannot be supervised or controlled by a court or an adjoining landowner. So long as the operations are legal, their reasonableness cannot be drawn in question. As was pointed out in Letts v. Kessler, 54 Ohio St. 73, it is intolerable that the owner of real property, before making improvements on his own lands, should be compelled to submit to what his neighbor or a court of equity might regard as a reasonable use of his property. Petroleum oil is a mineral, and while in the earth it is part of the realty, and, should it move from place to place by percolation or otherwise, it forms part of that tract of land in which it tarries for the time being, and, if it moves to the next adjoining tract, it becomes part and parcel of that tract; and it forms part of some tract until it reaches a well, and is raised to the surface, and then for the first time it becomes the subject of distinct ownership, separate from the realty, and becomes personal property,—the property of the person into whose well it came. And this is so whether the oil moves, percolates, or exists in pools or deposits. In either event, it is the property of, and belongs to, the person who reaches it by means of a well, and severs it from the realty, and converts it into personalty. While it is generally supposed that oil is drained into wells for a distance of several hundred feet, the matter is somewhat uncertain, and no right of sufficient weight can be founded upon such uncertain supposition to overcome the well-known right which every man has to use his property as he pleases, so long as he does not interfere with the legal rights of others. Protection of lines of adjoining lands by the drilling of wells on both sides of such lines affords an ample and sufficient remedy for the supposed grievances complained of in the petition and supplemental petition, without resort to either an injunction or an accounting. The cases of Columbus & H. Coal & I. Co. v. Tucker, 48 Ohio St. 41, and Collins v. Chartiers Valley Gas Co. 131 Pa. 143, 2 L. R. A. 280, and other like cases, in which some harmful substance was sent, conveyed, or caused to go from the premises of one to the premises of another, have no application here, because in this case nothing reached the plaintiff's lands from the premises of the defendant, and the only complaint is that the oil company so used its own premises as to secure and appropriate to its own use that which came into its lands by percolation, or by flowing through unknown natural underground channels. This it had a right to do. While the drilled oil well is artificial, the pores and channels through which the oil reached the bottom of the well are natural.

Judgment affirmed.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

Laura A. HARRIS, Rept.,
v.
Sherwood BURR et al., Appts.

(.....Or.....)

The right of women to vote at a school meeting for a director of a district, as provided by Sess. Laws 1891, p. 130, is not precluded by Const. art. 2, § 2, limiting the right to vote "at all elections authorized by law" to male citizens, as this is construed with the constitutional provision giving the legislature power to provide a system of common schools.

(February 14, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lane County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for refusing to permit plaintiff to vote at an election for school director. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. R. Skipworth, for appellants:

If plaintiff was not a "legal voter," she could not sustain damages, in contemplation of law, by the refusal of the judges of the election to receive and count her ballot.

Participation in the elective franchise is not a natural right, but a privilege conferred by law.

The Constitution declares that in all elections not otherwise provided for every white male citizen of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years, shall be entitled to vote at all elections "authorized" by law.

When the legislature of this state passed § 2599, it had no power to declare who should be legal voters at a school election other than as provided in art. 2, § 2, of the Constitution, and, the qualifications of voters being determined and limited by said § 2, the legislature cannot enlarge or abridge those qualifications; and therefore said act of February 20, 1891, is repugnant to the Constitution of this state, and is therefore void.

The act of February 20, 1891, provides qualifications for voters at school elections not included in § 2, art. 2, and also extends the elective franchise to female citizens who are not included in § 2, and therefore said act is null and void.

The definition of the word "manner" as given in 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 251, is, "literally handling a thing."

In Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39, 15 Am. Rep. 563, the court said: "The word 'manner' is one of large signification, but one thing is clear,—it cannot exceed the subject it qualifies or belongs to."

The principle here is the qualification of voters at all elections, and the manner, the mere handling, or the mere method of conducting the election and the regulation of those matters (not the qualification of voters) is within the legislative authority.

Const. art. 2, §§ 6-8; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 756; People, Ahrens, v. English, 189 Ill. 622, 15 L. R. A. 181; Fifth Ave. Bank v. Colgate, 22 Jones & S. 196; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 252, note 1.

The phrase, "manner of voting," literally interpreted, applies simply to the act of voting, which is provided for in the Constitution.

Kentucky Union R. Co. v. Bourbon County, 85 Ky. 98; Vollmer's Succession, 40 La. Ann. 593; Phillips v. Middlesex County Comrs. 122 Mass. 258.

The laws conferring or relating to suffrage are strictly construed.

The legislature had, under the Constitution, the power to establish a common-school system, but there is not even an implication in any of the provisions of the Constitution relating to that subject conferring on the legislature power to extend suffrage to women, nor to impose upon male citizens any different qualifications at a school election than already imposed by the Constitution.

Mr. George B. Dorris, for respondent:

When a state law is attacked it is presumable valid in any case, and this presumption is a conclusive one, unless in the Constitution of the United States or of the state we are able to discover that it is prohibited.

The right to vote in the United States comes from the states.

"Citizen" means "membership of a nation." In that sense women are citizens and have always been considered citizens of the United States, as much before as since the adoption of the 14th Amendment.

Minor v. Happersett, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 162, 174, 22 L. ed. 627, 630.

Wolverton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question presented by this cause is whether women are entitled to vote at a school meeting for director of the district in which such meeting is held. The plaintiff was awarded damages in the court below for having been denied the privilege of voting, from which judgment defendants appeal.

The law under which the right is claimed is as follows: "Sec. 1. In all school districts in this state with a population of 1,000 and upwards, any citizen of this state shall be entitled to vote at a school meeting who is twenty-one years of age, and has resided in the district thirty days immediately preceding the meeting and has property in the district upon which he or she pays a tax." Sess. Laws 1891, p. 130. The contention of counsel for defendants is that the law is violative of § 2 of art. 2 of the state Constitution, which reads as follows: "In all elections not otherwise provided for by this Constitution, every white male citizen of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who shall have resided in the state during the six months immediately preceding such election, and every white male of foreign birth of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who shall have resided in this state during the six months immediately preceding such election, and shall have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States one year preceding such election, conformably § 9 L. R. A.

to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization, shall be entitled to vote at all elections authorized by law." In this connection we direct attention to § 8 of art. 8 on "Education and School Lands," as we shall give a brief history of territorial and state legislation touching the organization and promotion of the common-school system. The section referred to is as follows: "The legislative assembly shall provide by law for the establishment of a uniform and general system of common schools." The act of Congress authorizing the territorial government of Oregon, approved August 14, 1848, provided, among other things, "that every white male inhabitant above the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of said territory at the time of the passage of this act, and shall possess the qualifications hereinafter prescribed, shall be entitled to vote at the first election, and shall be eligible to any office within the said territory; but the qualifications of voters and of holding office, at all subsequent elections, shall be such as shall be prescribed by the legislative assembly; provided, that the right of suffrage and of holding office shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States above the age of twenty-one years," etc. Under the power thus delegated, the territorial legislation provided by law "that all white male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years, who shall have resided within this territory for six months next preceding an election, shall be entitled to vote at any election for delegate to Congress, and for territorial, county, and precinct officers: provided, that they shall be citizens of the United States, or shall have declared their intentions, on oath, to become such, and shall have resided six months in the territory, and fifteen days in the county where they offer to vote, next preceding the day of election." Or. Stat. 1855, p. 6. On January 31, 1855, an act was passed providing for the election of county superintendents of common schools, for the division of the inhabited portions of the several counties into convenient school districts, the organization of new ones, for the election of directors and clerks to hold until the next annual meeting, and for the election of their successors at such time. It provided that the superintendents should be elected by the legal voters of the respective counties at the annual elections which under general law were to be held in the several election precincts in the territory on the 1st Monday in June of each year, and at the same time defined and prescribed the qualification of voters at school meetings as the laws of Congress permitted as follows: "Every inhabitant over the age of twenty-one years who shall have resided in any school district for one month immediately preceding any district meeting, and who shall have paid or be liable to pay any tax except road tax in said district, shall be a legal voter at any school meeting, and no other persons shall be allowed to vote." Or. Stat. 1855, pp. 458, 463. So far as we are now informed, this act was operative when the state Constitution was adopted in 1857. At its session of 1862 the state legislature revised the common-school system, and repealed the territorial act of January, 1855. The new act provided, as did the old, that the county superintendents should be elected by the legal voters of the several counties of the state, and such provision remains unchanged to the present time. The qualifications of voters at school meetings, however, were modified, and thus defined: No person shall be a voter at school meetings who is under twenty-one years of age, was not a resident of the district one month preceding such meeting, and unless he has paid other tax than road tax in the county in which the district is located; women who are widows, and have children and taxable property in the district, may vote, by proxy or in person, at such meetings, if they choose." Or. Gen. Laws 1862, p. 641. In 1872, the legislature again enacted that women who are widows and have children to educate, and taxable property in the district, and who have resided in the district thirty days, as aforesaid, shall be entitled to vote." Deady & Lane's (Or.) Comp. Laws, p. 511. In 1878 it was enacted that "any citizen of this state shall be entitled to vote at a school meeting who is twenty-one years of age, and has resided in the district thirty days immediately preceding the meeting, and who has property in the district upon which he or she pays a tax." Sess. Laws 1878, p. 67. This is the identical provision made applicable in 1891 to school districts having a population of 1,000 and upwards. As it pertained to all other districts, the law of 1878 was amended in 1889 by the addition of the words, "or has children of school age to educate." We have not adverted to all the modifications and changes in the law touching the subject, but the foregoing will suffice to indicate what manner of treatment it has continuously and uniformly received at the hands of the legislature.

Recurring to defendants' contention, it is argued that, notwithstanding these legislative enactments, the primary and fundamental law must govern, and that § 2, art. 2, of the Constitution is absolutely controlling in the premises. That the language of this section is so far-reaching and comprehensive as to include all elections provided for by law under any intendment of the Constitution looking throughout its whole scope and purview. The language employed does not make the purpose entirely clear. Reading the portions of the section about which the controversy arises in juxtaposition, we have: "In all elections not otherwise provided for by this Constitution, every white male citizen . . . shall be entitled to vote at all elections authorized by law." It is not thought that the latter clause enlarges or circumscribes the significance of the first, and the reasonable interpretation of the section is that every white male citizen, etc., shall be entitled to vote at all elections not otherwise regulated by the Constitution. In support of this proposition State, Allison, v. Blake, 57 N. J. L. 6, 25 L. R. A. 480, a strong case, and well reasoned, is cited with others of like results. The constitutional provision there considered is as follows: "Every male citizen of the United States . . . shall be entitled to vote for all officers that now are, or hereafter may be, elective by the people." The office about which the contention centered was that of road commissioner in a district of a subdivided township, and it was held that the Constitution applied to all officers, whether directly provided for therein or created by law, the incumbents of which are made elective by the people. Anticipating somewhat the position of the respondent, and in refutation thereof, the case of State, Kimball, v. Hendee, 57 N. J. L. 307, is also cited, wherein this language is used by Dixon, J., speaking for the court: "In State, Elkin, v. Deshler, 25 N. J. L. 177, it was adjudged that trustees of school districts were officers, within this constitutional provision. But it is said this adjudication has ceased to be authoritative, because, since it was rendered, an amendment of the Constitution has imposed on the legislature the express duty of providing for the maintenance and support of a thorough and efficient system of free public schools. I am quite unable to see how the imposition of this duty affects the question whether school trustees are officers, or whether if they are made elective by the people, any other than constitutional voters may vote for them. This duty of the legislature must be performed in accordance with all other constitutional provisions." These authorities illustrate quite clearly the defendants' position.

Upon the other hand, the contention of counsel for plaintiff is, in effect, that the authority granted by the Constitution to the legislative assembly to "provide by law for the establishment of a uniform and general system of common schools" is a thing quite apart from the fundamental provisions touching suffrage and elections, in so far as it respects school districts which comprise the primary unit of the school system and its officers. That is to say that, while the elective franchise thus defined and established is applicable in elections to fill all constitutional offices and those provided for by law, yet that by the special grant of authority to the legislature to devise a uniform and general system of common schools it has been empowered, not only to call into requisition the school district as the fundamental unit of the system, but to prescribe what officers should be chosen to promote and maintain its existence, together with their powers and duties, term of office, and how and by whom they should be chosen. And it is urged that the contemporaneous and subsequent exposition of the Constitution by the legislative assembly as exemplified by its acts has much to do with strengthening the position. The following authorities are cited in support thereof: Belles v. Burr, 76 Mich. 1; Re Gage, 141 N. Y. 112, 25 L. R. A. 781; Plummer v. Post, 144 Ill. 69, 19 L. R. A. 110; Opinion of the Justices, 115 Mass. 602; State, Crosby, v. Cones, 15 Neb. 444; Wheeler v. Brady, 15 Kan. 26. The Michigan case is much to the purpose from an historical analogy as well as from the similarity of those features of the constitutional provisions bearing upon the question under consideration. The provision of the Michigan Constitution relating to suffrage and elections in force at the time the decision was rendered was adopted in 1850, and is as follows: "In all elections every male citizen, every male inhabitant, . . . shall be an elector, and entitled to vote; but no citizen or inhabitant shall be an elector or entitled to vote at any election unless he shall be above the age of twenty-one years, and has resided in this state three months, and in the township or ward in which he offers to vote ten days, next preceding each election." Article 7, § 1. Section 4, art. 18, provides that "the legislature shall, within five years from the adoption of this Constitution, provide for and establish a system of primary schools, whereby a school shall be kept, without charge for tuition, at least three months in each year, in every school district in the state." A former Constitution, adopted in 1885, contained provisions not essentially different except the words "a system of common schools" were used instead of "a system of primary schools." Under the older Constitution the legislature of 1888 confined the right of suffrage at school meetings to males residing in the district, and who were liable to pay a school tax, making no distinction between aliens and citizens. In 1846 the privilege was extended somewhat, and the amendment then adopted was stricken out in 1847. Thereafter the law remained as in 1888 until 1855, and was in force at the time of the adoption of the Constitution under which the decision was rendered. In 1855 qualified voters at school meetings were defined to be "all taxable persons residing in the district of the age of twenty-one years, and who have resided therein for the period of three months next preceding the time of voting." This law was amended in 1867, and again in 1881. But in the history of such constitutional provisions and the legislation under them the qualifications of an elector at school meetings have never been identical with those of an elector under the Constitution. "In view of this fact," says Morse, J., "it must have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution of 1850, when they provided that the legislature should establish a school system, following the Constitution of 1885 in that respect, that under such provision the legislature should have full power to fix and determine the qualifications of voters under such system, and this without regard to the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution for electors at other elections." Language of similar import, by Finch, J., characterizes the New York case. Speaking of the contention of counsel for appellant that school officers were not constitutional officers, because the practical interpretation of that instrument has long and invariably been to the contrary, he says: "That is true, and only true, of the officer of the school district, as the fundamental unit of the school system. The trustees of such a district are the authorized business managers of the school within its boundaries, and the legislature has always assumed, and been permitted to assume, the right to determine who might vote for such trustees, and what qualifications should or should not be requisite and necessary. To that class of school officers intrusted with the government and control of the simple school district, by itself alone, and within its own boundaries, the constitutional provisions have never been applied." The Illinois case is of similar tenor, distinguishing the case of People, Ahrens, v. English, 149 Ill. 622, 15 L. R. A. 181, wherein it was held that women had no right under the Constitution to vote for county superintendent of schools, he being an officer recognized by the Constitution, and within the purview of the provisions relating to suffrage and elections. The cases from Massachusetts, Nebraska, and Kansas are also in point. Several of these cases bear a striking analogy to the one at bar. Under the territorial law of 1855 every inhabitant above the age of twenty-one without regard to sex, residing in the school district one month, and who paid, or was liable to pay, a tax except road tax, was declared to be a legal voter at school meetings. By the same act, which prescribed the qualifications of voters at school meetings, it was ordained that a county superintendent of common schools should be elected by the legal voters, as elsewhere defined, of the respective counties. While such was the law, the Constitution was adopted and the state admitted into the Union, the Constitution itself by special provision continuing all laws of the territory consistent therewith in force until altered or repealed. In 1869 the state legislature, by an act relating to common schools, revised the entire scope of the school system theretofore existing, and by special mention repealed the territorial laws above referred to. This act provided for the election of a county school superintendent by the legal voters of the several counties of the state, but provided that widows having children and taxable property in the district might vote by written proxy or in person at school meetings. Since that time the legislature has frequently acted upon the subject, and the present law is the outgrowth of numerous amendments. But at all times during the various changes, and as the law now stands, the qualifications prescribed for voters at school meetings have been and are broad enough to permit of women exercising the privilege, while the legislature has constantly and uniformly required that a county superintendent shall be elected by the legal voters of the several counties. The office of county superintendent of common schools was created under § 7, art. 6, of the Constitution, and is recognized and treated as a county office. State, Carter, v. Stevens, 29 Or. 464. And there can be no question but that the term "legal voters," as applied to the election of that officer, is such as the Constitution has defined under § 2, art. 2. So that the state legislature has at all times, following in the wake of the territorial legislature, discriminated between legal voters who are qualified to vote for officers recognized or created under the Constitution and voters at school meetings. Thus we have a direct legislative interpretation of the fundamental law, not only approximately contemporaneous with the adoption of that instrument, but by its every subsequent act whenever it has legislated upon the subject. If we ascribe to the constitutional convention cognizance of the laws of Congress and the territorial regulations thereunder touching the common-school system, as we must, because of the learning and sagacity of its members, there is strong reason for believing that they legislated fundamentally with reference to the conditions as they found them, especially as we find the legislature of 1862, so near the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and composed of some of the same members, revising the school system, and to that end specially repealing acts at least supposed by them to have been carried over, and continued operative, by the very terms of the Constitution itself. These considerations lead to the conclusion that the power ascribed to the legislature under the Constitution to provide for the establishment of a uniform and general system of common schools carries with it plenary power to establish the unit of that system, denominated a school district, to determine what officers shall administer its affairs, who and what manner of persons shall be eligible to office, and how and by whom they should be chosen. The elective franchise conferred by § 2, art. 2, does not, nor was it intended to fix and define the qualification of voters at school meetings, but was designed only to govern in all general and special elections not otherwise provided for by the Constitution, and applies to the election of all officers known to the Constitution, as well as to such as may be provided for thereunder aside from those provided for under the special power of the legislature to establish a uniform and general system of common schools. There is strong logic in defendants' contention, and yet it is believed there is sufficient ground for distinguishing the New Jersey constitutional provisions from our own. If, however, we are mistaken in this, then there is a sharp conflict in the authorities, and we feel bound to adopt the legislative construction which was placed upon this feature of the Constitution from its inception, and has ever since been maintained. "That women are successful educators," says Maxwell, J., in State, Crosby, v. Cones, 15 Neb. 444, "is fully shown by experience." And in Opinion of the Justices, reported in 115 Mass. 602, supra, it is said that "the common law of England, which was our law upon the subject, permitted a woman to fill any local office of an administrative character, the duties attached to which were such that a woman was competent to perform them." So that there existed high authority for the inauguration of the exact system of common schools that we now have under the Constitution as interpreted by the legislature in the adoption of laws for its promotion.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

Maria SULLIVAN

v.

Stephen WATERMAN.

(.... 20 R. I.)

1. A man who hires lodging rooms in a dwelling house is liable to the owner for injuries to the good name of the house and the damage to the owner's custom and business, if he brings dissolute and immoral persons to such rooms and applies the rooms to the purposes of assignation or to create a nuisance therein.
2. An allegation that acts constitute a nuisance is not necessary where the acts, as stated, amount to a nuisance in fact and in law.
3. A declaration for a private nuisance need not allege special damage, but a general claim for damages will sustain a recovery of such actual damages as are the natural and proximate consequence of the wrong.

(January 24, 1898.)

ON DEMURRER by defendant to the complaint in an action to recover damages for defendant's alleged unlawful use of rooms which he had hired in plaintiff's house. Over-ruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wilson & Jenckes and William J. Brown, for defendant, in support of demurrer:

There is no allegation that the acts complained of constituted a nuisance, either public or private; nor are there any sufficient allegations to entitle the plaintiff to maintain an action of this character.

None of the acts alleged and complained of constitute of themselves a public nuisance. Moreover, even if they did constitute such a nuisance still this plaintiff does not state any cause of action, for she has not alleged that she has suffered any actual, specific damage therefrom, and without such actual, specific damage an action of this kind cannot be maintained.

Wesson v. Washburn Iron Foundry Co. 18 Allen, 95, 90 Am. Dec. 181; Milbau v. Sharp, 27 N. Y. 612, 84 Am. Dec. 314; Grigsby v. Clear Lake Waterworks Co. 40 Cal. 396; Benjamin v. Storr, L. R. 9 C. P. 400; Fritz v. Hobson, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 542.

The declaration does not set forth any acts that are in themselves unlawful.

Where the act complained of is not of itself unlawful, there is no right of action unless there is some actual damage.

2 Jaggard, Torts, 779; Wood, Nuisances, § 104.

There is no allegation of any actual specific injury.

Baxter v. Winooski Turnp. Co. 22 Vt. 114, 52 Am. Dec. 84.

Mr. C. M. Salisbury, for plaintiff, contra.

Tillinghast, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff complains, in an action of trespass on the case, that the defendant, who hired certain rooms in her house, so misbehaved himself while in the occupancy of said rooms as to injure the plaintiff in her business, and in the good name, credit, and reputation of her house. The declaration sets out, in substance, that the plaintiff is, and for a long time before the grievances complained of was, the owner of a certain dwelling house, in which she lives, in the city of Providence, and where she was engaged in keeping a lodging house for hire and profit; that the defendant hired certain rooms of her in said house for the purpose of using the same in a reasonable and proper manner, and was at the time when the grievances complained of were committed in the possession thereof; that, contriving and intending to hurt and injure the good name and credit of said house, the defendant grossly misbehaved himself therein, in this: that upon the 10th day of May, 1897, in the night-time, and upon divers other nights between that time and the date of plaintiff's writ, he brought or caused to come to his said rooms certain dissolute and immoral women, without the knowledge and against the will of the plaintiff, and kept said women there till a late hour in the night, in consequence whereof certain good people who had intended to take rooms in said house for hire did not take them, whereby the plaintiff suffered loss and damage. The declaration also sets out that on the 20th day of May, 1897, in the night-time, and upon divers other nights, the defendant allowed one John Doe to use said rooms so hired as aforesaid for the purpose of bringing or causing to come into said rooms certain other dissolute and immoral women, without the knowledge and against the will of the plaintiff, and said women to keep in said rooms till a late hour of the night, thereby intending and contriving to injure, and actually injuring, the plaintiff as aforesaid. The declaration further charges the bringing of other dissolute and immoral persons, both male and female, to said rooms, both in the day-time and in the night-time, there to revel, drink, and carouse, and to commit other immoral acts, whereby plaintiff was injured and damaged as aforesaid. To this declaration the defendant has demurred on the ground that it does not set forth any unlawful or wrongful act of the defendant upon which an action for damages can be founded. In support of this demurrer he contends that there is no allegation that the acts complained of constituted a nuisance, either public or private, and further that, even if the acts complained of did constitute a nuisance, still the declaration does not state a cause of action, because the plaintiff does not allege that she has suffered any "actual specific" damage therefrom.

NOTE.—As to saloon as a nuisance, see Haggart v. Stehlin (Ind.) 22 L. R. A. 577.

We think the declaration states a cause of action. It cannot be seriously argued that a man who hires rooms in a dwelling house, to be used as lodging rooms, has any right to apply them to the purposes of assignation, or to create a nuisance therein. And that a wrong which arises from the unreasonable or unlawful use by a person of his own premises, or from his own improper, indecent, or unlawful personal conduct, working an obstruction of or injury to the right of another, is a nuisance, is clear, both upon sound principles of reason and judicial authority. See Wood, Nuisances, § 1, and cases cited. "A nuisance," says Smith in his Manual of the Common Law, "is something done which has the effect of prejudicially and unwarrantably affecting the enjoyment of the rights of another person." See also Aldrich v. Howard, 8 R. I. 246. Of course, it must arise from some unlawful act; for that which is lawful can never be a nuisance. Some legal right must be violated, and some material annoyance, injury, and damage must be sustained, thereby. But, where there is a material injury, damage is implied, when it results from the violation of a legal right. Wood, Nuisances, § 5, and cases cited. The declaration in the case at bar shows the violation of a legal right. The plaintiff had the right to the good name and fame which her house had acquired in the community, and to the income and profit which such a reputation aided in producing. They are elements of value in the prosecution of her business, and she is as much entitled to be protected in the enjoyment thereof as she is in the enjoyment of any other property. The good name of a boarding house, or lodging house, like the good name of an hotel or other place of entertainment, is of vital importance to the success of the proprietor; and anyone who wrongfully injures such good name is guilty of a tortious act, which the law will redress in damages. The declaration shows that the defendant by his misconduct has injured the good name of the plaintiff's house, and that by reason thereof she has been damaged by the loss of custom and business. In other words, it shows the commission of a wrong resulting in injury and damage; and, this being so, it states a case for redress,—there being, in contemplation of law, no wrong without a remedy. It is true, as argued by defendant's counsel, that the declaration does not, in terms, allege that the acts complained of constituted a nuisance; but we do not think that this is necessary, so long as said acts, as stated, amount to a nuisance in fact and in law; and to allege in the declaration therefore, that they constituted a nuisance, would simply be to state a conclusion of law. The ordinary forms for declarations in actions of this sort simply set out the acts complained of, without averring that they constitute a nuisance. See Chitty, Pl. ed. 1821, 429 et seq.; Oliver, Precedents, 8d ed. 878.

We do not think the declaration is demurrable because it does not allege that the plaintiff has suffered special damage from the acts complained of. The nuisance alleged was evidently a private one, and, so far as appears, the plaintiff was the only one who was injured thereby; and we see no reason why, under a general claim for damages, she is not entitled to recover, as a recompense for her injury, such actual damages as are the natural and proximate consequence of the wrong committed. See Sedgwick, Damages, 6th ed. pp. 732, 733. If the defendant deems it essential to his defense that he should be more particularly informed of the matters for which he is to be put on trial, the court, on motion, would probably order such information to be furnished. Tourgee v. Rose, 19 R. I. 432. The cases cited by defendant's counsel relate to public nuisances, and in such cases it is necessary for a person suing for a private injury therefrom to allege and prove special damage. Benjamin v. Storr, L. R. 9 C. P. 400; Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. pp. 736, 737, and cases cited.

Demurrer overruled, and case remitted to the common pleas division for further proceedings.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

Sanders SPURLOCK, Appt.,

v.

Daniel NOE et al.

A judgment against an insane person, and a sale of real estate in satisfaction thereof,NOTE.—*Insanity as affecting judgments.I. Validity and effect of judgments against insane persons.*a. Generally.*b. As to purchasers.*II. What degree of insanity affects.*III. Enforcement.*IV. Collateral attack.*V. When relieved against.*VI. Relief, how obtained.*VII. Effect of inquisition.*I. Validity and effect of judgments against insane persons.*a. Generally.

A judgment is not rendered absolutely void by the fact that the judgment debtor was insane at the time of its rendition. Pollock v. Horn, 13 Wash. 626; Withrow v. Smithson, 37 W. Va. 757, 19 L. R. A. 762; White v. Hinton, 3 Wyo. 753, 17 L. R. A. 86. It is still a lien on land. Withrow v. Smithson, 37 W. Va. 757, 19 L. R. A. 762.

A lunatic may be sued for a debt which he contracted when of sound mind, and a judgment therefor obtained against him. Stigers v. Brent, 50 Md. 214, 33 Am. Rep. 317; Ex parte Leighton, 14 Mass. 207.

And judgments at law, and decrees in equity, may be properly entered against persons who are non compos mentis, when they are properly represented. King v. Robinson, 33 Me. 114, 54 Am. Dec. 614.

A person to whom a debt is due from a lunatic is entitled to have it evidenced by a judgment against his debtor or such debtor's committee and the common law should either give judgment thereon, or else transfer the cause for proper proceedings in equity. McNees v. Thompson, 5 Bush, 686.

And the mere fact that a party defendant is non compos mentis during any of the preliminary proceedings in an action, or when judgment is rendered, constitutes no defense where the liability is one for which he is legally bound. King v. Robinson, 33 Me. 114, 54 Am. Dec. 614.

And the rule was the same at common law. King v. Robinson, 33 Me. 114, 54 Am. Dec. 614.

And a judgment in attachment against a lunatic is regular where a guardian ad litem was duly appointed, and he accepted the trust, whether he acted or not. Foster v. Jones, 23 Ga. 168.

A judgment or decree against an insane person who is properly brought before the court is valid and binding, and neither void nor voidable. Maloney v. Dewey, 127 Ill. 395; Speck v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 121 Ill. 83; Weber v. Wetling, 18 N. J. Eq. 441; Crippen v. Culver, 13 Barb. 428.

And is as binding upon him and his property interests as a similar judgment would be upon a sane person, where a guardian ad litem had been appointed for him and had properly represented him. Bensieck v. Cook, 110 Mo. 173.

So, a judgment recovered against a lunatic after the appointment of a committee of his person and estate, without first obtaining leave from a court of equity to institute the suit, is neither void nor 39 L. R. A.

will not be set aside long after on the ground of his insanity, if he was going at large and attending to his own affairs without objection up to the time of the sale, and upon appointment of a committee for him two years later no steps were taken to set aside the judgment, although he had no other property.

(November 19, 1897.)

erroneous, and the party acting under it is not a trespasser. Crippen v. Culver, 13 Barb. 428.

And a judgment is not rendered void or voidable by the fact that the defendant became insane during the pendency of the suit and after the court had acquired jurisdiction of the person by citation, appearance, and answer, where the defendant was represented by counsel and no suggestion of insanity was made. Fleming v. Seeligson, 57 Tex. 524.

And the subsequent insanity of a defendant will not render a judgment against him void where jurisdiction was obtained by the publication of the notice as prescribed by law. Weber v. Wetling, 18 N. J. Eq. 441.

So, a judgment rendered against a person who is subsequently found to be of unsound mind may be revived by action against the judgment debtor and his committee. McNees v. Thompson, 5 Bush, 686.

And the judgment in a suit against a lunatic is properly rendered against the lunatic himself, and not against his guardian. Walker v. Clay, 21 Ala. 797.

So, where no guardian has been appointed for an adult non compos, suit for necessities must be prosecuted against him, and his estate must pay any judgment that may be recovered. Ex parte Northington, 37 Ala. 496, 79 Am. Dec. 67.

It is no ground for setting aside a proceeding at law that the defendant was a lunatic or otherwise incompetent to manage his own affairs at the time the action was brought, or that he has become so since; and the plaintiff can safely proceed to judgment without the appointment of a guardian or attorney. Robertson v. Lain, 19 Wend. 649.

And a judgment thus obtained, though irregular, is not void. Dunn v. Dunn, 114 Cal. 210; Foster v. Jones, 23 Ga. 168; Allison v. Taylor, 6 Dana, 87, 32 Am. Dec. 68; White v. Hinton, 3 Wyo. 753, 17 L. R. A. 86; Sternbergh v. Schoolcraft, 2 Barb. 153.

And this is the rule though it was obtained by one who had knowledge of the insanity without the interposition of a guardian. Johnson v. Pomeroy, 31 Ohio St. 247.

Jurisdiction of an insane defendant is acquired by a court by the service of its summons, and the failure to appoint a guardian ad litem when the general guardian fails to appear and defend does not render the judgment therein either void or voidable; it is at most only erroneous. McAllister v. Lancaster County Bank, 15 Neb. 285.

And a judgment is as valid and binding as any other judgment, until set aside or reversed. Maloney v. Dewey, 127 Ill. 395.

And a judgment against a lunatic cannot be set aside upon the ground of absence of jurisdiction of the person of defendant because at the time he and his property were in the charge of the committee duly appointed by the court of chancery. The judgment is not void, or even erroneous, and cannot be reversed on error, as the justice had full jurisdiction of the person of defendant, subject only to the interference of the court of chancery. Sternbergh v. Schoolcraft, 2 Barb. 153.

So, that the defendant is insane is no objection to signing judgments on a warrant of attorney. Pigot v. Killick, 4 Dowl. P. C. 287, 1 H. & W. 518.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Harlan County setting aside a judgment and sale of land to enforce it on the ground that the judgment defendant was insane. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Howard & Clay, for appellant:

A judgment or any proceedings against a person of unsound mind is not void, but voidable; but as to what degree of insanity renders proceedings against a person of unsound mind voidable there does not seem to be any fixed rule.

Facts showing that he believed in witches, and would fight them up the chimney and say he was keeping them off, are not evidence of insanity.

Lewis v. Arbuckle, 85 Iowa, 835, 16 L. R. A. 677.

Any opinion of the witnesses, not coupled

And the subsequent insanity of a person who has given a power of attorney to confess judgment will not affect the right to enter judgment thereon, as a power thus conferred by a sane man and placed in the hands of a creditor, is not revocable. Spencer v. Reynolds, 9 Pa. Co. Ct. 249.

A bond and warrant of attorney executed by a person subsequently found by inquisition to have been at the time of unsound mind and incapable of governing himself or managing his affairs, and a judgment entered thereon by confession, may be set aside, however, upon terms, in the discretion of the court; but they are not absolutely void, and will not be set aside unconditionally where it appears that for several years prior to the execution of the bond and warrant the alleged lunatic had been permitted by his friends to exchange lands and buy and sell property and give notes, bonds, and mortgages. Person v. Warren, 14 Barb. 488.

And if a waiver of inquisition is a part of a judgment rendered upon a note with warrant of attorney to confess judgment, then the defendant, though a lunatic, is bound by it, and his committee cannot question its validity in a subsequent action; but if it was not a part of the judgment the defendant, if he was so destitute of reason and understanding as to be incapable of assenting to it, is not bound, and the committee are not estopped from denying the validity of a purchaser's title under it. Hope v. Everhart, 70 Pa. 231.

But a sale of land under a judgment on a f. fa. passes title where the judgment was rendered on a bond with a warrant to confess judgment containing a waiver of inquisition and condemnation, which was filed, and judgment confessed thereon by the attorney who filed the declaration, appearing for the defendant in the ordinary way by virtue of the warrant, all of the proceedings appearing in the docket, and the waiver being a part of the record, and is not subject to collateral attack on the ground that the judgment debtor was paralytic and helpless and unable to write. Hageman v. Salisbury, 74 Pa. 280.

In Hageman v. Salisbury, 74 Pa. 280, supra, Hope v. Everhart, 70 Pa. 231, infra, V., was distinguished upon the ground that that case wholly lacked the superadded appearance of an attorney for the defendant, and his confession of judgment therefor expressly waiving the inquisition and condemnation.

So, a judgment for taxes rendered against an insane person on personal service without appearance in person or by attorney or guardian ad litem is voidable only, and not void, where the court had jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter. Heard v. Sack, 81 Mo. 610.

And a judgment against the surety of a forthcoming bond in an attachment proceeding without notice to such surety is not void because of his insanity at the time of its rendition, where he was not insane at the time the bond was given, no notice being necessary in case of such a judgment against a sane man. Pollock v. Horn, 13 Wash. 626.

So, a fine levied by an idiot is not voidable though his idocy is apparent, and though after the fine levied he was found by inquisition to be an idiot from birth, the indentures executed by him being 89 L. R. A. sufficient to direct the uses of the fine. Manfield's Case, 12 Coke, 124.

Before a lunatic can be personally affected by a judgment upon a contract made by him, however, it is necessary that process should be prayed for and issued against him and be served upon him, and such a judgment is invalid where process was prayed for and issued against and service made upon his guardian only. Scott v. Winningham, 79 Ga. 492.

b. As to purchasers.

Title to land sold passes upon a judgment and execution and sale thereunder, though the judgment debtor was a lunatic at the time of its rendition. Tomlinson v. Devore, 1 Gill, 345.

A sheriff's deed is not void because of the insanity of the judgment debtor when the judgment under which the execution was issued was rendered; it is voidable only. Thomas v. Hunsucker, 108 N. C. 720.

And in a proper case the purchaser will be protected. Foster v. Jones, 23 Ga. 163.

A purchaser at an execution sale under a judgment rendered against a person subsequently found to have been insane at the time of its rendition, by proceedings then pending, will be held to obtain title where there is no evidence of complicity between him and the sheriff, or that he was a party to any scheme to defraud the judgment debtor, and he is not shown to have had any intimate knowledge of her or to have taken advantage of her situation, and it was not shown that her insanity was notorious. Rau v. Katz, 26 La. Ann. 463.

Public policy forbids that a judgment shall be questioned on account of the insanity of the judgment debtor and the failure to procure the appointment of a guardian as against an innocent purchaser who has acquired rights under it. Dunn v. Dunn, 114 Cal. 210.

So, a sale of the land of an insane person on execution issued on a confessed judgment against him will not be set aside where the purchaser was not a party to the judgment, and had no knowledge of the insanity of the judgment debtor. Crawford v. Thomson, 161 Ill. 161.

And a mortgage and judgment of foreclosure, and a sale thereunder of the mortgaged premises, will not be annulled at the suit of the heirs at law of the mortgagor upon the ground that she was insane and incompetent to transact business or to understand the nature of her act at the time, where the purchaser had no knowledge of such insanity and purchased in good faith and for a valuable consideration. Dunn v. Dunn, 114 Cal. 210.

And a judgment in partition is not invalidated so as to affect the title of a purchaser thereunder by the fact that one of the parties in interest was insane and resided in a foreign country, and that a tutor had been there appointed, who appointed an attorney in fact to represent him in the state, as the tutor may exercise his office by agent. Vick v. Volz, 47 La. Ann. 42.

So, a stranger who in good faith purchases property sold under a judgment for taxes is not affected by the fact that the person upon whom such taxes were imposed was at that time, and at the time of

with a statement of facts showing upon what that opinion is based, is entitled to very little or no weight.

Shirley v. Taylor, 5 B. Mon. 99; Jones v. Perkins, 5 B. Mon. 223.

Messrs. J. Smith Hays, N. B. Hays, and S. B. Dishman for appellees.

Guffy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the allegations in the petiservice on him and the rendition of the judgment and making of the sale, of unsound mind and incapable of transacting business, and that the judgment for taxes was subsequently reversed on that ground. Heard v. Sack, 81 Mo. 610.

And a mortgagor cannot take advantage of his own insanity at the time of making the mortgage, and the rendition of a conditional judgment founded thereon, on a writ of entry brought by him against the assignee of the mortgage who is in possession by virtue of an execution issued on such judgment while the judgment remains unreversed. Lamprey v. Nudd, 29 N. H. 290.

A sale of the land of a lunatic on execution issued on a confessed judgment against him, wherein the judgment creditor became the purchaser, however, is properly vacated and set aside where they knew he was insane and unfit to transact ordinary business when they secured the confession. Crawford v. Thomson, 161 Ill. 161.

But knowledge upon the part of a purchaser under a judgment entered upon a note containing a warrant to confess judgment and waiver of inquisition, of facts showing that the judgment debtor was insane and incapable of executing a valid waiver, must be clearly established by the evidence before his title is declared void. Hope v. Everhart, 70 Pa. 231.

II. What degree of insanity affects.

Capacity to understand and comprehend the effect and result of legal proceedings is the test laid down in the principal case, and this seems to accord with the current of authority.

Thus, a court will not proceed to render judgment against a man or his estate where it is clear and certain that he has no capacity to take care of himself or to employ some other person to do it for him. Leach v. Marsh, 47 Me. 548, 74 Am. Dec. 508.

Unsoundness of mind amounting to incapacity to do or understand business is a good cause for setting aside a default and opening a judgment rendered thereon. McClain v. Davis, 77 Ind. 419.

So, an elderly woman sixty-seven years of age, having but little knowledge of the world or of business, who could neither read nor write, should be relieved from a judgment obtained against her upon default in an action for foreclosure of a mortgage, where she did not understand the summons when it was read to her, or know what it meant, or understand that she had any interest in the matter, when she had a good and valid defense. Adams v. Citizens' State Bank, 70 Ind. 89.

And the committee of a lunatic is entitled to relief against a judgment taken by default upon a promissory note executed by his ward under Ind. practice act, § 99, where the maker of the note was of unsound mind, incapable of understanding the obligations of the contract when he executed it, and the consideration thereof had entirely failed. McClain v. Davis, 77 Ind. 419.

And a judgment taken by a creditor against a debtor for goods fairly sold, of which the debtor had the benefit, though he then had sufficient capacity to understand the transaction, at a subsequent time when he had not sufficient capacity by tion in this action that Elizabeth Noe, W. T. Hall, and Robert Napier claimed debts against Nathan Noe, and procured a sale of a large and valuable tract of land in Harlan county, being the place where the said Noe lived in his lifetime, giving a description of the land. It is further alleged that the land was sold, and that defendant Sanders Spurlock (now appellant) became the purchaser at the price of $780. It is further charged that at the time of said sale and judgment Nathan Noe was a reason of insanity to understand his rights and duties as a party to the action, and no guardian was appointed for him, making no allowance for a payment which had been made, cannot be enforced against his estate. Litchfield's Appeal, 28 Conn. 127 73 Am. Dec. 662.

To annul a judgment upon the ground of the insanity of the judgment debtor, however, the evidence should be as conclusive of insanity as is required to justify a decree of interdiction. Covas v. Bertoulin, 44 La. Ann. 688.

And the fact that a person is intensely eccentric, and that at times his utterances on the subject of religion are extravagant and unreasonable and he is subject to delusions and hallucinations, will not affect the validity of the judgment against him where the hallucinations and delusions were not permanent, and that was not shown to be the prevailing condition of his mind. Covas v. Bertoulin, 44 La. Ann. 683.

And the opening of a judgment and an order granting a new trial is not warranted by the fact that the party against whom it was rendered was in feeble health, and some of the witnesses expressed the opinion that her mind was affected by it, where it is clear that she had sufficient capacity to transact business, and that though she could not attend court she retained experienced, competent, and faithful counsel to represent her, and had the assistance of her son, who advised with the counsel, and the suit appears to have been diligently, earnestly, and zealously prosecuted. Wyne v. Newman, 75 Va. 816.

But melancholy under which a person labors will excuse inattention to his affairs and authorize relief against judgments obtained against him during such a state of mind, though he may not be so absolutely insane as to avoid his contracts. Tabb v. Gist, 6 Cal. (Va.) 279.

So, a judgment in a partition suit will not be set aside on account of the lunacy of a party, where it was only partial and with respect to particular matters and did not affect his capacity to transact business. Speck v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 121 Ill. 33.

A judgment in an action for slander may be properly enjoined, however, where at the time of speaking the defamatory words, and when the judgment was obtained, the judgment debtor was insane and in a state of partial derangement on the subject to which the defamatory words related. Horne v. Marshall, 5 Munf. 466.

And a man of information and intelligence on general subjects, comprehending the general relations of things, but who was wholly irrational and uncontrollable and irresponsible as to any business transactions connected with the right of the civil government to impose taxes upon its subjects and the obligation of the citizen to submit thereto, deeming it sinful to pay tribute to temporal powers, is entitled to protection against a judgment for taxes assessed against him. Heard v. Sack, 81 Mo. 610.

So, judgment will not be permitted to be entered upon a warrant of attorney to secure the retransfer, upon demand, of stock loaned, after which the lunatic, and incapable of attending to any kind of business, and did not owe the debts for which said land was sold; and that said land is worth $8,000; and that said Spurlock has had the sole use and occupation of said land, and the rents thereof, for — years. It is also alleged that nearly all of the plaintiffs at the time of said sale were infants, and that their father was destitute of mind, and that he made no defense against said debts, or the sale of the land, and did not know that such a suit was going on, and that immediately after the sale Nathan Noe was adjudged to be a lunatic, and carried to the lunatic asylum, where he remained two or three years, was pronounced incurable, and sent back to Harlan county, and died. Several amended petitions were filed, and on motion some portions thereof were stricken out. The real issue finally presented was that Nathan Noe was of unsound mind at the time of the rendition of the judgment, and that he did not owe person giving the warrant becomes and continues to be insane, where the formal demand for the retransfer was made upon him, as such a demand must be made upon a person capable of understanding it. Capper v. Dando, 4 Nev. & M. 335, 2 Ad. & El. 458, 1 H. & W. 11.

III. Enforcement.

Judgments obtained against a person who becomes a lunatic, previous to his lunacy, are prior liens upon his estate, but all other debts attach equally and have equal claim to payment. Wright's Appeal, 8 Pa. 57.

The liens of creditors having judgments against a lunatic's estate rendered while he was sane are not affected by proceedings in lunacy, though perhaps a question may be raised as to the proper procedure for the enforcement of his lien. Re Eckstein, 1 Clark (Pa.) 224, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 59.

And a preference may be secured by a proceeding in aid of execution on a judgment against an insane person commenced before the inquest of insanity, where the estate of the insane judgment debtor is insolvent. Johnson v. Pomeroy, 81 Ohio St. 247.

And a lien or preference obtained by a creditor by judgment against an insane person or proceedings in aid of execution thereunder before the inquest of insanity must be respected by the guardian to the same extent that such preference secured in the lifetime of an insolvent debtor must be respected by his representatives. Johnson v. Pomeroy, 81 Ohio St. 247.

So, the property of a lunatic is not exempt from the operation of the execution issued upon a judgment not fraudulently or wrongfully obtained, though it was rendered subsequent to the judicial establishment of his insanity. Pollock v. Horn, 13 Wash. 626.

And where a judgment is obtained against a lunatic, and an execution issued and levied upon his property before the institution of proceedings in lunacy in a court of chancery, the judgment and execution will not be set aside upon summary application by the committee, although they are overreached by the finding of the jury upon the commission of lunacy. Re Hopper, 5 Paige, 490.

A proceeding in aid of execution cannot be resisted by the guardian of the judgment debtor, and a decree preferring the creditor prosecuting it cannot be prevented by showing that his ward was insane before the commencement of the proceeding, and that his estate was insolvent. Johnson v. Pomeroy, 81 Ohio St. 247.

So, at common law a defendant could not be discharged from arrest or imprisonment under body execution issued on a judgment in a civil suit on the ground that he was insane at the time of the arrest, or became so afterwards. Bush v. Pettibone, 4 N. Y. 300.

A person who was non compos mentis, and for whom a guardian had been appointed, is still liable to be sued in a civil action, and to be committed in execution. Ex parte Leighton, 14 Mass. 207.

And the order of discharge of a judgment debtor confined under body execution issued on a judgment against him under the New York act to organize the state lunatic asylum authorizing the first judge of the county to discharge a prisoner confined on civil process and send him to the asylum, must contain a direction that he be thus sent, or it will be void, rendering the sheriff liable as for an escape. Bush v. Pettibone, 4 N. Y. 300.

And a prisoner confined under body execution on a judgment against him, who is sent to an asylum for insane persons under the New York statute authorizing the discharge of a prisoner confined on civil process, may, on being restored to sanity, be again arrested by his creditor. Bush v. Pettibone, 4 N. Y. 300.

So, knowledge on the part of a sheriff having an execution in his hands that suit had been instituted against the execution debtor to have her interdicted, does not warrant him in staying a sale of the property seized. If parties in interest desire to stop the sale they should enjoin it. Rau v. Katz, 26 La. Ann. 463.

And a judgment should not be rendered against him for effecting a sale under a judgment rendered against a person who was subsequently found by inquisition to have been insane at the time of its rendition by proceedings then pending, as he was acting only under the directions of a court of competent jurisdiction in carrying out its decrees. Rau v. Katz, 26 La. Ann. 463.

A creditor of a person who becomes a lunatic and is so found by inquisition, however, cannot obtain a lien upon his estate and a preference over other creditors by a judgment obtained after inquisition found. Wright's Appeal, 8 Pa. 57.

The court in which a suit is pending brought by a creditor to reach the assets of his debtor, pending which the debtor is adjudged an habitual lunatic in proceedings previously commenced in another court, and a committee is appointed of his estate, cannot properly proceed to final judgment. Niblo v. Harrison, 9 Bosw. 668.

And debts contracted by a lunatic or habitual drunkard after the appointment of a committee and without his consent cannot be paid out of the estate, although established by a judgment at law against the lunatic or drunkard. Re Heller, 3 Paige, 199.

So, an attachment issued on a judgment will be dissolved where the defendant therein had been reported as a lunatic without lucid intervals by inquisition covering the date of the judgment. Harmstead v. Kingsley, 3 W. N. C. 64.

And a judgment against one who was subsequently found to be of unsound mind cannot be thereafter satisfied by execution. McNees v. Thompson, 5 Bush, 686.

A creditor of a person found to be a lunatic by due course of law cannot issue and levy an execution on his personal property in the hands of his committee appointed by the court. Re Eckstein, 1 Clark (Pa.) 224, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 59.

It is improper for a creditor to levy an execution upon a judgment obtained by him upon the property of a lunatic without permission of the chancellor or vice chancellor having jurisdiction of the proceedings in lunacy. Re Hopper, 5 Paige, 490.

the debts sued for, and was a lunatic at the time of the confirmation of sale and conveyance of the land to Spurlock. All the material averments of the petition were denied by Spurlock. It appears from the pleadings, and there is some testimony conducing to show, that John D. Noe, son of Nathan Noe, purchased the land at the commissioner's sale at the price named. It is further contended by plaintiffs that the purchase was made by an agreement with appellant Spurlock to the effect that he (Spurlock) was to have the land; all of which, however, is denied by Spurlock. The value of the land is estimated by witnesses all the way from $1,000 to $4,000. There is no proof conducing to show that the debts on which the judgment was rendered were not just and due. A considerable amount of testimony was introduced in the case. It further appears that Nathan Noe left thirteen children, ten of whom united in the petition for a recovery of the land, or rather for a setting

And motion for leave to issue execution on a judgment against a lunatic rendered before his lunacy will be refused by the supreme court where there is no property which he can see ought to be sold under an execution issued from such court, but leave will be granted to the plaintiff to proceed on the judgment for its payment by action in the superior court of the proper county, that court alone having power to deal with the subject under the North Carolina statute. Adams v. Thomas, 83 N. C. 521.

And leave to sue the committee of a lunatic nunc pro tunc will not be ordered in an action pending which a committee is appointed for him and in which judgment is subsequently rendered. A proper remedy in such case is to institute an independent action by leave of the court against the lunatic and against his committee. Re Delahunty, 28 Abb. N. C. 245.

A judgment creditor under a judgment rendered against an insane person will not be allowed to touch either the person or the estate of the judgment debtor, but will be obliged to apply to the committee or to the court of chancery for the payment of his debt, and as a general rule he will then be required to establish justice on his demand without reference to the judgment and without any allowance of costs. Robertson v. Lain, 19 Wend. 650.

The sole remedy of a creditor against the personal estate of a lunatic found such by inquisition, to obtain payment of his debt, is by application to the court, which will require the committee to raise the necessary funds from the lunatic's estate for that purpose. Re Eckstein, 1 Clark (Pa.) 224, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 59; Brasher v. Cortlandt, 2 Johns. Ch. 400.

But the plaintiff in a proceeding in the nature of an action at law, pending which the defendant is adjudged an habitual drunkard and a committee appointed of his estate by another court, may be permitted to proceed to judgment, upon which he may apply to the court having jurisdiction of the estate to require payment by the committee. Niblow v. Harrison, 9 Bosw. 668.

And an action may be brought against a lunatic under the Pennsylvania statute for the purpose of establishing the amount of the debt which the committee is directed to defend, but it must stop there and collection cannot be enforced. Wright's Appeal, 8 Pa. 57.

And an action brought by a creditor against a debtor, pending which the debtor is adjudged an habitual drunkard and a committee appointed of his estate by proceedings previously commenced in another court, will not be dismissed, but proceedings therein will be stayed until the reformation of the defendant and the discharge of his committee, if such event should occur, so as to permit the plaintiff to retain the advantage obtained. Niblo v. Harrison, 9 Bosw. 668.

One who proceeds with the enforcement of a judgment obtained against an insane person with knowledge that proceedings have been instituted by or on behalf of the defendant to be relieved therefrom, however, takes the chance that if a judgment is reversed or set aside he will be compelled to restore his adversary to the situation he was in before erroneous judgment was rendered. Dickerson v. Davis, 111 Ind. 433.

IV. Collateral attack.

A judgment sought to be set aside on the ground that the judgment debtor was of unsound mind must be assailed directly as it is not vulnerable to collateral attack. Boyer v. Berryman, 123 Ind. 451; Lamprey v. Nudd, 29 N. H. 299; Noel v. Modern Woodmen of America, 61 Ill. App. 597; Brittain v. Mull, 99 N. C. 483; Dunn v. Dunn, 114 Cal. 210.

It is conclusive as to any point directly in issue. Lamprey v. Nudd, 29 N. H. 299.

And a judgment against one non compos mentis is binding upon him and those in privity with him so long as it stands unreversed or is not set aside in some direct proceeding instituted for that purpose. Ewing v. Wilson, 63 Tex. 88.

And if the court had jurisdiction it can be vacated on the ground of the insanity of the judgment debtor only by some direct proceeding at law either in the court in which it was recovered or in some other court having appellate jurisdiction. Wynne v. Newman, 75 Va. 816; Lamprey v. Nudd, 29 N. H. 299.

Thus, a title derived from a purchase under a judgment against one who was non compos mentis cannot be attacked in an action of trespass to try title until such judgment is reversed or set aside by some direct proceeding instituted for that purpose. Ewing v. Wilson, 63 Tex. 88.

So, a judgment rendered against an insane person without the interposition of a guardian cannot be impeached by a subsequently appointed guardian of the insane judgment debtor in an action in aid of execution without alleging fraud or unfairness upon the part of the judgment creditor though he had knowledge of the insanity. Johnson v. Pomeroy, 81 Ohio St. 247.

And a decree against a person who had been adjudged insane, founded upon an agreement made by his counsel, is voidable only and not subject to collateral attack, and is binding upon parties and privies until vacated or set aside by a direct proceeding. Denni v. Elliott, 60 Tex. 337.

So, the validity of a decree of a circuit court of the United States cannot be attacked in a state court upon the ground that a party was insane at the time he was served with process and the decree was rendered. Maloney v. Dewey, 127 Ill. 386.

And a suit brought against a lunatic and prosecuted bona fide to judgment under Pennsylvania act of assembly, is conclusive as to the amount and merit of the plaintiff's demand. Re Eckstein, 1 Clark (Pa.) 224, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 59.

And the committee of a lunatic cannot, in an action of ejectment, collaterally impeach the judgment under which the land in question was sold though the finding of lunacy overreaches the judgment and the transaction on which it was based, where it was entered on a warrant to confess judgment on his note, which warrant contained a waiver of inquisition, which waiver was made a part of the judgment. Weaver v. Brenner, 21 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 439.

In Weaver v. Brenner, 21 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 439, aside of the judgment and sale, and praying that the land be adjudged to them. It appears also that Spurlock, having heard of some dispute about the land, obtained a deed from three of the children of said Nathan Noe, for which, he said, he paid $10 apiece to two of them. Appellant's contention is that John D. Noe bought the land without any arrangement with him, and that he afterwards purchased the same from John D. Noe, and by appropriate orders of the Harlem circuit court same was conveyed to him by the commissioner of the court. There is some evidence conducing to show that the sale was made in 1881, and the deed made to Spurlock in 1882, and that afterwards Nathan Noe was, by the county court of Harlem, adjudged to be a lunatic, and sent to the lunatic asylum; and that in 1884 he was returned as incurable and harmless, and one of his sons was appointed as committee, and took charge of him, and drew $75 per year for his support, until the time of his death, which period is not well established, but some records introduced tend to show that he probably died in 1889. The court, upon final hearing, adjudged in favor of the plaintiffs supra, Hope v. Everhart, 70 Pa. 231, infra, V., was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the waiver was contained in the note, and was not therefore a part of the judgment entered.

So, a judgment determining the question whether the lunacy of the defendant when the note on which suit was brought was executed, formed a defense to it, though erroneous, is not void, and cannot be impeached when made the foundation of a subsequent suit. Sternberg v. Schoolcraft, 2 Barb. 153.

And a judgment in an attachment suit cannot be collaterally attacked in an action to set aside the sale therein and to have the judgment under which it was made declared null and void on the ground of the insanity of the judgment debtor. Pollock v. Horn, 13 Wash. 623.

Nor is the original judgment assailable on account of the insanity of the judgment debtor on the trial of a scire facias to revive it, and the record of proceedings in lunacy had after the entry of the judgment is inadmissible either under the plea of null tiel record or as evidence of incompetency to execute the note on which judgment was entered. Henry v. Brothers, 48 Pa. 70.

And refusal to open the original judgment upon a scire facias to revive a judgment to which the defendant pleaded his own lunacy is not the subject of a writ of error. Henry v. Brothers, 48 Pa. 70.

So a common recovery is by judgment, and such judgment is valid until reversed, and cannot be collaterally impeached. Wood v. Bayard, 63 Pa. 320.

If a man non compos mentis levies a fine, or suffers recovery, or acknowledges a suit or recognition, neither his heir nor his executor shall have them, for these are matters of record. Beverley's Case, 4 Coke, 123b.

But the making of a deed to bar an entail is a matter in pais, and does not stand on the same footing as the entering of judgments in a court of record, and evidence is admissible to show that the grantor was non compos mentis, or that, being of a weak mind, he was imposed upon for the purpose of avoiding such deed. Wood v. Bayard, 63 Pa. 320.

The general rule that judgments of courts of general jurisdiction are not subject to collateral attack, however, does not apply to an action for divorce brought against a wife who had been taken by her husband to a different state and confined in an asylum therein, and when so absent was sued by him and judgment obtained on constructive service from which there was no appeal or writ to modify and vacate, and no new trial could be had. Newcomb v. Newcomb, 13 Bush, 544, 26 Am. Rep. 222.

V. When relieved against.

Judgments rendered against a lunatic may be examined and their fairness ascertained, and the equitable rights of the lunatic will be protected. Demelt v. Leonard, 19 How. Pr. 142.

And such a judgment or decree, though not void, 89 L. R. A.

may be opened up within the time limited by statute to admit of a valid defense. White v. Hinton, 3 Wyo. 753, 17 L. R. A. 66.

And the rule that in a foreclosure suit the chancellor will decree a sale of the whole premises when the defendants stand by and do not suggest that the mortgaged premises greatly exceed in value the amount of the mortgage debt does not apply where any of the defendants are non compos mentis, in which case every protection will be extended to them of which a sane adult could avail himself. Eslava v. Lepretre, 21 Ala. 504, 56 Am. Dec. 265.

So, a judgment entered against a defendant while proceedings on a writ de lunatico inquirendo were pending, on which a few days after the entry of the judgment it was found that the defendant was non compos mentis, will be opened so as to let in a defense, and execution thereon will be set aside, but the judgment will be permitted to stand as security until further proceedings. Ash v. Conyers, 2 Miles (Pa.) 94.

And a judgment entered upon a warrant of attorney on a note given at a time when the maker was subsequently found to have been insane by a commission in lunacy may be opened to let in a defense, although the judgment plaintiff was not a party to the proceeding in lunacy. Glass v. Hilberg, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 621.

And a judgment by default after due service of process upon a note which had been obtained by fraud and without consideration by the original payee may be set aside and the default opened as against a good-faith purchaser of the note, and the guardian or administrator will be let in to defend upon the showing that the ward was of unsound mind when the note was made and the judgment taken. Dickerson v. Davis, 111 Ind. 433.

And an innkeeper who has harbored an infant and furnished him supplies against the law and contrary to the directions of his guardian, who obtains judgment bonds from him before and after he arrives at the age of maturity, which are overreached by an inquisition finding him incompetent to contract on account of habitual drunkenness, will not be allowed to retain the fruits of his improper conduct, and judgments entered thereon will be set aside and canceled. L'Amoureux v. Crosby, 2 Paige, 422, 22 Am. Dec. 655.

So the legal representatives of a lunatic have the right to institute proceedings to set aside a confession and judgment thereon against him under § 15, chap. 86, Ill. Stat., with relation to lunatics, providing that every contract made with an idiot, lunatic, or distracted person before he or she has been adjudged an idiot, lunatic, or distracted person may be avoided. Crawford v. Thomson, 161 Ill. 181.

And the fact that the holder of a note made by an insane person was an indorsee for value without notice does not affect the right to relief from a judgment rendered thereon, under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 386, providing that a party may be relieved on a judgment taken against him through his mis-to the extent of $\frac{1}{3}$ of the land conveyed to Spurlock, holding, in effect, that he was entitled to his purchase money, with interest, and pay for valuable improvements to the extent they increased the vendible value of the land, and to be held accountable for reasonable rents, and referred same to the master commissioner to take proof and report as to these items, and from that judgment Spurlock has appealed.

We deem it unnecessary to determine as to the question of the statute of limitation pleaded and relied upon by appellant, or to determine as to whether the proper parties were all before the court. It will be seen from the record that the judgment was rendered in 1881, and sale confirmed in 1892, before the inquest as to the sanity of Noe, and that at least from 1884 one of his sons was his committee, having him in charge, and drawing $75 per annum from the state for his support, on the assumption that he was a pauper lunatic. There is proof conducing to show that at and before the rendition of the judgment and sale of the land Nathan Noe was in bad health, afflicted with the palsy, and that he was of unsound take, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. Dickerson v. Davison, 111 Ind. 438.

Nor is the committee of a lunatic estopped by a judgment rendered upon a note containing a warrant of attorney to confess judgment and a waiver of inquisition, from denying the validity of the title of a purchaser thereunder, where the waiver of inquisition was not contained in the warrant or made part of it and was the act of the defendant himself, when he was incapable of executing a valid waiver and the purchaser was aware of his incapacity. Hope v. Everhart, 70 Pa. 281.

And the right of an administrator of an insane person to have a default set aside and a judgment against such insane person opened, is not affected by the fact that such insane person's guardian redeemed his ward's land from an execution sale had under such judgment, such redemption having been made to save the property of the ward. Dickerson v. Davis, 111 Ind. 438.

That the defendant was a lunatic, however, is no ground for relief against a judgment at law unless it appears that he was not represented. Henderson v. Mitchell, Bail. Eq. 113, 21 Am. Dec. 526.

And a judgment will not be vacated and set aside and a new trial granted upon the ground that the judgment debtor was insane, unless it is made to appear to the court that a different result would probably be reached if a new trial should be granted, or that injustice has been done on the original trial. Brambill's Case, 6 Ct. Cl. 238.

And an action cannot be maintained by the committee of a lunatic for the return of property taken from him on execution under a judgment against him, and for damages consequent upon the taking and detention thereof, or for the money value of such property after the appointment of a committee, where the demand was just and no defense thereto is established. Crippen v. Culver, 13 Barb. 428.

Nor can an action to set aside a judgment upon the ground that the judgment debtor was of unsound mind and incapable of transacting his own business at the time the judgment was rendered be maintained under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 306, providing for relief against judgments taken through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, unless it appears that the complainant had a valid and meritorious defense to the cause of action upon which the judgment complained of was rendered. Woods v. Brown, 93 Ind. 164, 47 Am. Rep. 369.

So, that no guardian had been appointed for a non compos mentis cannot be alleged as error in a proceeding to reverse a judgment rendered against him, as there is no legal obligation resting upon the court or upon the plaintiff to ascertain the facts and have such a guardian appointed. King v. Robinson, 33 Me. 114, 54 Am. Dec. 614.

And an action by a guardian under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 309, 1881, § 306, to be relieved from a judgment alleged to have been taken against a former guardian of his ward through excusable neglect, and to secure the opportunity to present a defense to the action upon the ground that the ward was not served with summons to appear in the action and did not authorize an appearance by attorneys therein, cannot be maintained where such ward was insane and under guardianship at the time the action was commenced, and was therefore neither a proper nor necessary party thereto. Jones v. Crowell, 143 Ind. 218.

And a decree divesting all right and title of a party to certain real estate will not be vacated and set aside in an action for such relief upon the ground that the agreement upon which it was based was entered into by him at a time when he was so far insane as to incapacitate him from contracting, and that his mental incapacity existed at the time the decree was made, where the jury did not find that he was insane at the time of the decree. Brown v. Rentfro, 57 Tex. 327.

So, the plaintiff in an action to foreclose a mortgage executed by a husband and wife in which the wife appeared and answered in her own right on behalf of her husband who was then insane, who takes issue on such answer and voluntarily goes to trial thereon without objecting to the appearance of the wife on behalf of her husband, cannot raise such objection by motion in arrest of judgment. Yount v. Turnpaugh, 33 Ind. 46.

And a decree of foreclosure against the guardian of an insane person upon whom service was made will not be set aside under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 399, upon the ground of excusable neglect, where the record shows that an attorney appeared for him, though the act of the latter was unauthorized, unless it appears, not only that such attorney had no authority, but also that there was a meritorious defense, and that the rights of bona fide purchasers or other innocent third parties have not intervened. Jones v. Crowell, 143 Ind. 218.

And a judgment in partition in which some of the parties were lunatics will not be set aside upon the ground that the summons was not served upon the lunatics and their committee under Ky. Civil Code, § 53, providing that if a defendant be of unsound mind the summons shall be served on him and on his committee if residing in the county, where the committee filed an answer for all, which is authorized by analogy by Ky. Civil Code, § 490, authorizing the committee in the name of the lunatic and his own to sue for and obtain judgment for the sale of property owned jointly by the lunatic and other if it be indivisible. Finzer v. Nevin, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 773.

VI. Relief, how obtained.

A writ of error or an appeal is the proper remedy where the record of a judgment shows that the judgment debtor was insane at the time it was rendered. Allison v. Taylor, 6 Dana, 87, 32 Am. Dec. 68; Re Hopper, 5 Paige, 491; Lamprey v. Nudd, 29 N. H. 299.

And the appropriate remedy where judgment has been taken against an insane person of whom the court acquires jurisdiction by the service of its summons, but fails to appoint a guardian ad litem when the general guardian fails to appear, is by mind, and, in the judgment of sundry witnesses, not capable of transacting business. It further appears that he was going at large, and attended, without restraint, to his own affairs, up to and after the confirmation of the sale, and that no steps were taken to place his affairs in the hands of a committee, or have him adjudged a lunatic, until after the confirmation of the sale. The testimony of appellant is that he regarded him as capable of attending to his business, and was not aware of his lunacy, and that he (appellant) had nothing to do with the judgment or sale of the land until after the same was purchased by said Noe. The decisive question in this case is whether or not Nathan Noe was of such un-proceedings in error, and not by an original action to vacate the judgment. McAlister v. Lancaster County Bank, 15 Neb. 295.

And judgment rendered against a person admitted to be non compos mentis and incapable of taking care of himself and managing his business affairs at the time may be reversed on writ of error. Leach v. Marsh, 47 Me. 548, 74 Am. Dec. 503.

In Leach v. Marsh, 47 Me. 548, 74 Am. Dec. 503, supra, King v. Robinson, 33 Me. 121, 54 Am. Dec. 614, supra, IV., was distinguished upon the ground that in that case it was not admitted, as it is in this, that the plaintiff in error was actually non compos. And exception was taken to the statement therein that "the law does not appear to have imposed it as a duty to be performed by a plaintiff to ascertain the mental capacity of the defendant, and to bring it before the court for its consideration, that such a guardian may be appointed."

But a writ of error on a scire facias to review a judgment brings up only the proceedings in a scire facias where the record of the first judgment is not before the court except so far as it is exhibited in replication to the plea of null tel record. Henry v. Brothers, 48 Pa. 70.

So, a circuit-court judge has power, after the expiration of a term, to issue the writ of error coram nobis to reverse a judgment of conviction in a criminal prosecution when it appears that the accused was insane when tried, and the fact was not made known at the trial, and if it is disputed by the state he may cause a jury to be impaneled to try such issue, and the venue for the trial of such issue may be changed to another county, but the change carries the whole case. Adler v. State, 35 Ark. 517, 37 Am. Rep. 48.

And where the fact of insanity is judicially known only from an admission in the record of another suit brought to enforce the purchase of the lunatic's land under execution of the judgment against him, relief may be had upon a writ of error coram nobis. Allison v. Taylor, 6 Dana, 87, 32 Am. Dec. 68.

And a judgment for taxes, rendered against an insane man, may be reviewed and the error rectified in the court where committed, on writ of coram nobis, and there seems to be no limitation as to the time within which such a motion or writ of error may be invoked. Heard v. Sack, 81 Mo. 610.

But a writ of error coram nobis, or a motion in lieu thereof, is not a proper process to reverse a judgment against a person who was insane at the time of its rendition, where there was no suggestion of his insanity in the record of the judgment; the remedy in such case is by action in equity. Withrow v. Smithson, 37 W. Va. 757, 19 L. R. A. 762.

So, the remedy of a lunatic against whom a judgment has been obtained and execution issued and property taken in satisfaction thereof is by application by the court appointing his committee to restrain the prosecution of the suit at law and to punish the plaintiff for contempt. Crippen v. Culver, 13 Barb. 428; Re Hopper, 5 Paige, 491.

And where a judgment is irregular or erroneous on the ground that the suit was prosecuted against one who was legally incompetent to make any defense thereto the remedy is by summary application to the court in which the judgments were obtained, or by writ of error. Demelt v. Leonard, 19 How. Pr. 142.

And if there is no remedy at law, and judgments have been recovered against a lunatic for pretended claims which were not justly due, it may be proper for the committee to proceed by bill in equity to be relieved against such judgments. Re Hopper, 5 Paige, 491.

And after a judgment against a lunatic has stood beyond the statutory period within which it may be reviewed, set aside, or opened up as provided for by Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 386, relief can only be had by appealing to the equity jurisdiction of the court, and in such case it might be necessary to show that the judgment plaintiff had been guilty of some fraud or unfairness in taking it. Dickerson v. Davis, 111 Ind. 438.

The proper remedy of a lunatic against whom a judgment has been rendered is to apply to chancery to restrain the proceedings and compel the plaintiff to come there for justice, and where the proceeding was originally in chancery the court has all the jurisdiction that any court can have to relieve against any harm. Maloney v. Dewey, 127 Ill. 305.

And an injunction will be granted to restrain a judgment creditor who issues an execution on his judgment and levies on personal property in the hands of the committee of a lunatic. Re Eckstein, 1 Clark (Pa.) 224, 1 Para. Sel. Eq. Cas. 59.

Unless a judgment against a lunatic is obtained before the appointment of a committee for him, it is within the power of the chancellor to restrain the enforcement of the claim against such lunatic. Re Delahunty, 28 Abb. N. C. 245.

And the remedy of a lunatic against whom a judgment has been rendered subsequent to the judicial establishment of his insanity is by action in equity to set aside the judgment where it was fraudulently obtained. Pollock v. Horn, 18 Wash. 638.

A judgment and subsequent proceedings thereon will not be set aside in a court of law for irregularity, however, on the ground that a judgment debtor had been found by inquisition to be a lunatic or an habitual drunkard; the committee should apply to a court of chancery for relief. Clarke v. Dunham, 4 Denio, 262.

And that a defendant was a lunatic or otherwise incompetent to manage his own affairs at the time an action was brought against him, or that he has since become so, is not ground for setting aside proceedings at law, it must be left to the court of chancery to enforce its own jurisdiction. Robertson v. Lain, 19 Wend. 650.

But a judgment against a lunatic may be set aside by the supreme court in New York where courts of chancery have been abolished and their general jurisdiction in law and equity has been conferred upon that court, and difficult questions of fact arising may, on a motion therefor, be referred to a referee. Demelt v. Leonard, 19 How. Pr. 142.

Equity in interposing against a judgment against an insane person, however, will require justice to be done to the creditor by way of payment of whatever was due. Litchfield's Appeal, 23 Conn. 127, 73 Am. Dec. 682.

And a judgment entered upon a bond and warrant of attorney against a lunatic in good faith, by a creditor, will not be set aside without restoring to him so much of the estate of the lunatic as has sound mind at the time of the rendition of the judgment and the sale of the land as to render the same void or voidable. The presumption of law is that all men are sane, and capable of understanding the nature and effect of contracts, and all suits and proceedings in court, and, although a party may be in bad health, and his mind, to some extent, impaired, yet, if he has sufficient mind to understand and comprehend the nature and effect of contracts, or comprehend and understand the effect and result of legal proceedings, the same are binding upon such persons. In this case the judgment and sale complained of were rendered at a time when Nathan Noe was going at large, and attending to his own business, actually been benefited by the transaction for which they were given. Loomis v. Spencer, 2 Paige, 138.

And one who sues a lunatic for a debt, and obtains judgment at law, must give up his advantage and pay his own costs before a court of chancery will interfere for his relief. Re Heller, 3 Paige, 199.

And a court of chancery has no power to annul a judgment and set aside the verdict of a jury and order a new trial in an action at law, on the ground that the judgment debtor therein was insane. It may act on the parties, but not directly on the judgment, nor on the court which rendered it. Wryne v. Newman, 75 Va. 818.

So, a judgment against an insane person cannot be vacated or modified under Ohio Code Civ. Proc. § 534 et seq., providing a remedy by a proceeding in the court rendering the judgment for erroneous proceedings against a person of unsound mind, where the condition of the defendant, or the error in the proceeding, does not appear upon the record, until it is adjudged that there is a valid defense to the action. Johnson v. Pomeroy, 31 Ohio St. 247.

And while relief may probably be obtained in equity against a judgment rendered against an insane person where the proceeding provided for by the Ohio Code cannot be had, it would be necessary in such case to show that the judgment, through some fraud or unfairness, was such as in equity and good conscience should not stand. Johnson v. Pomeroy, 31 Ohio St. 247.

In Stigers v. Brent, 50 Md. 214, 33 Am. Rep. 317, however, it was held that a bill in equity will not lie to set aside a judgment on the ground that the judgment debtor was a lunatic when no actual fraud, collusion, or conspiracy was charged.

This ruling was placed on the ground that in Maryland no statute exists to authorize equitable interference, and Re Eckstein, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 56, and Brasher v. Cortlandt, 2 Johns. Ch. 408, supra, III., were distinguished upon the ground that the decisions therein were rendered under the peculiar provisions of a state statute.

So, audita querela will lie to set aside a judgment rendered upon a writ issued by a justice of the peace against one who was insane and under guardianship at the time, as such justice has no jurisdiction, and consent in such a case cannot confer it. Miller v. Potter, 54 Vt. 287.

And an action will lie to set aside a tax deed made under a judgment for unpaid taxes which was regular on the face of the record, where at the time of the accruing of the taxes, as well as at the time of service upon the owner and the rendition of the judgment and making of the sale, he was of unsound mind and incapable of transacting business. Heard v. Sack, 81 Mo. 610.

And it is optional with the court, on a proceeding in equity to avoid a judgment for taxes against a lunatic, whether it will submit issues to the jury or not, and it may or may not adopt the finding of a jury. Heard v. Sack, 81 Mo. 610.

In Heard v. Sack, 81 Mo. 610, supra, Robertson v. Lain, 19 Wend. 850, and Clarke v. Dunham, 4 Denio, 282, supra, and Sternbergh v. Schoolcraft, 2 Barb. 153, supra, I., were distinguished upon the ground that the rulings therein had their foundation in a special statute of New York conferring jurisdiction on the chancery court.

An action to have judgments vacated and declared fraudulent and void upon the ground that the judgment debtor was insane when they were rendered must be commenced in Texas within two years after the removal of such disability. Fleming v. Seeligson, 57 Tex. 524.

And the Texas Constitution of 1890, art. 12, § 14, providing that insane persons shall not be barred of their rights of property by adverse possession or law of limitation of less than seven years, from and after the removal of each and all their respective legal disabilities, does not apply to an action to have a judgment vacated and declared fraudulent and void because of the insanity of the judgment debtor. Fleming v. Seeligson, 57 Tex. 524.

VII. Effect of inquisition.

An inquisition of insanity appointing guardians for a person found to be insane is prima facie evidence that he was non compos mentis upon an issue as to his soundness of mind at the time at which a judgment was rendered against him. White v. Palmer, 4 Mass. 147.

And a finding of the jury upon an inquisition of lunacy that a person had been of unsound mind and incapable of taking care of herself, or her affairs, without interval, for about nine years, is presumptive evidence that she was a lunatic at the time a judgment was obtained against her within that period. Demelt v. Leonard, 19 How. Pr. 142.

And the record of an inquisition and proceedings under a commission in lunacy finding a judgment debtor to have been a lunatic without lucid intervals for about twenty years is prima facie evidence of his incapacity to execute a waiver of inquisition under which his property was sold under the judgment. Hope v. Everhart, 70 Pa. 231.

So, a commission of idiocy finding a party to be of sound mind, and a fine and recovery suffered by him, and the caption of the fine and a warrant of attorney and caption, are conclusive evidence of the capacity of the party to make the warrant of attorney and suffer a recovery, where the issue upon his sanity is joined after his death, and the warrant of attorney and caption appear to have been made and acknowledged before the chief justice at the same time that the caption of the fine was taken and acknowledged before him. Hume v. Burton, 1 Ridgeway, P. C. 204.

But the appointment by the court of a guardian ad litem for a lunatic defendant is not cause for reversal of judgment where the record shows that he appeared and pleaded by his guardian ad litem and by attorney,—especially where it appears that the guardian ad litem was appointed at the instance of the defendant's attorney. Walker v. Clay, 21 Ala. 797.

And an inquisition finding that a person against whom a judgment had been rendered was a lunatic, had several years after the rendition of the judgment, is not evidence that such person was a lunatic at the time of its rendition. Shirley v. Taylor, 5 B. Mon. 99.

And insanity of an individual at a particular period from the effect of some violent disease does not authorize the inference of his insanity several months later, at the time of service of a writ upon him and the rendition of a judgment against him. Hix v. Whittemore, 4 Met. 545. F. H. B.

without restraint or objection from his friends, or from his numerous family of children. It is true that he was found a lunatic after confirmation of the sale, and by statute the verdict of the jury should have shown the date of his first attack; but, if such was shown by the proceedings, the plaintiffs have failed to exhibit the record in that case. It also appears that one of his sons was appointed his committed in 1884, and, although said Nathan Noe was reported as having no property, no steps were taken by said committee, or anyone else, to set aside the judgment or sale complained of. Public policy requires that the judgments and orders of courts should not be lightly vacated or set aside upon the assumption that the parties against whom the same was rendered were lunatics at the time of such rendition; and, taking all the facts and circumstances proved in this case into consideration, it seems to us that the evidence is not sufficient to establish such unsoundness of mind upon the part of Nathan Noe as to authorize the sale, confirmation, and deed to be set aside or vacated.

For the reason indicated, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition of appellees, and for proceedings consistent herewith.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ST. LOUIS SOUTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

Paul JONES, Admr., etc., of Samuel Berger, Deceased.

(64 Ark. 613.)

1. A conductor beating a passenger who slapped his face with his hand renders the carrier liable if he uses force greatly exceeding that which would appear to a reasonable man necessary to repel the assault.
2. A carrier has the burden of showing that its conductor in beating a passenger in alleged self-defense used no more force than appeared to him as a reasonable man necessary to repel the assault.
3. The refusal of a proper instruction is not ground of reversal if it could not have been prejudicial.

(Bunn, Ch. J., and Wood, J., dissent.)

(January 22, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Miller County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged assault made upon plaintiff by defendant's servant. Affirmed.

Statement by Hughes, J.:

Appellee filed his suit in the circuit court of Miller county, alleging that on June 4, 1894, while a passenger on the road of appellant, en route between Lewisville and Texarkana, the conductor of the train, Randall Silverman, cursed and abused him wilfully, and did beat, bruise, and illtreat him, striking him with a lantern, by reason of which curses, blows, and illtreatment he was damaged in the sum of $20,000. Appellant answered, denying that appellee was a passenger, and alleging that the wounds received by appellee at the hands of Randall Silverman were received in a personal encounter between himself and Silverman, for which appellee alone was responsible; that the altercation was brought about by appellee striking the conductor in the face; that appellee's attack on the conductor was not occasioned, by a desire to protect himself, but originated in anger towards the conductor, because of the attempt of the said conductor to prevent him from making improper advances towards a young lady passenger on said train; that the conductor, in defending himself and in striking appellee, acted, not as the agent of appellant, but in his own individual capacity, for which appellant is in no wise responsible. Upon trial, verdict was for appellee in the sum of $700, for which judgment was rendered.

At the instance of appellee the court gave the following instructions: "(1) If the jury find, from a preponderance of the evidence in this case, that, as alleged in the complaint, plaintiff was on the 4th day of June, 1894, a passenger in a coach of defendant, being transported from Lewisville, Arkansas, to Texarkana, Arkansas, and that, while being so transported as a passenger by the defendant, without lawful cause, he was beaten and wounded by the conductor of the defendant in charge of said train, and said plaintiff was thereby injured or damaged in any amount, then is plaintiff entitled to recover. (2) The fact that the plaintiff may have first struck said conductor would not excuse or justify said conductor in using against plaintiff any more force than sufficient to protect said conductor from said blow, or a repetition thereof, or from any further violence at the hands of plaintiff. (3) Though the jury should believe, from the evidence, that plaintiff made the first assault upon the conductor on defendant's train, still, if they further believe, from the evidence, that the conductor so attacked repelled plaintiff's assault with more force and violence, and did more injury to plaintiff, than was reasonably necessary for his own protection from injury at the hands of plaintiff, then, as a matter of law, the conductor using such excessive force would be guilty of assault and battery; and if, in this case, defendant seeks to justify the assault and battery committed by the conductor upon the plaintiff, if you find such an assault and battery was made, from the evidence, on the ground that plaintiff first assaulted the conductor, it is incumbent on the defendant to show that no more force was used than the exigencies of the case called for. The force used must be suitable in kind and reasonable in degree; otherwise, the justification fails. An assault by a passenger upon a conductor of a train will not justify the conductor in pursuing and punishing the passenger after the assault is over. If he does so, he makes the defendant liable for the injury. (4) If the jury believe, from the evidence, that the plaintiff was guilty of indecorous conduct towards the lady passenger, then it was the duty of the conductor of the train to use all necessary and reasonable means to protect her from insults or annoyance, but he would have no right to abuse or insult the plaintiff as a punishment for such conduct; the conductor's duty being only to prevent a continuation of such conduct by the use of all necessary and reasonable means. (6) The jury are instructed that the facts, if proved, that the plaintiff may have spoken the first word or made the first remark to the conductor on the defendant's train, and this word or remark so spoken by plaintiff brought on the difficulty, and caused the assault and battery which ensued, and the plaintiff struck the first blow, would not, of itself, excuse or justify said conductor in using against the plaintiff any more force than was reasonably necessary to protect him (said conductor) from said blow, or a repetition thereof, or from any further violence at the hands of plaintiff." To the giving of each of which the appellant separately excepted.

The appellant asked the court to give the following instructions, which the court refused: "(2) The jury are instructed that, while the defendant is responsible for the acts of its conductors, in their treatment of passengers, done in the line of their duty, in the scope of their authority, yet the conductor has the right to resent and resist an assault made on him by a passenger, or anyone else, and his act in resisting or resenting such an assault is a personal act of the conductor, for which the principal (the defendant in this case) is not responsible. (3) If the jury find, from the evidence, that the assault of the defendant's conductor on the plaintiff was not malicious, and was not the result of a reckless disregard of plaintiff's rights as a passenger, but was occasioned by the assault of plaintiff on the conductor, and was made to repel and resent such assault, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover any damages for the pain, suffering, or humiliation experienced by him, and your verdict should be for the defendant. (5) If the jury find, from the testimony, that the conductor in charge of the train on which plaintiff was a passenger did strike plaintiff, and injure him, as claimed by plaintiff, and that in so doing he used more force than was necessary in order to repel any assault which may have been made on him by the plaintiff, or that he used more force than was necessary in order to prevent any improper interference with another passenger on the train by the plaintiff, and you also find that the unnecesary force and violence on the part of the conductor was done under excitement and in anger, occasioned by the assault of plaintiff, or by improper conduct of plaintiff towards another passenger, then plaintiff cannot recover, as against defendant, and your verdict will be for defendant. (6) If the jury find, from the testimony, that the plaintiff was a passenger on the defendant's railroad at the time and place claimed by him, and that he was beaten and bruised by the conductor of said train with a lantern, and that from the said beating and bruising the plaintiff has suffered physical pain, and may probably continue to suffer therefrom, and also experienced humiliation by reason thereof, and that said beating and bruising was caused by the act of plaintiff in slapping the said conductor's face, by which the said conductor was angered and excited, and while so angered and excited gave the blows with the lantern, then your verdict should be for the defendant, although you should find, from the testimony, that the conductor used more force than was necessary to repel the assault made on him by the plaintiff." Of which the court amended instruction No. 8, by adding at the end thereof the words, "Unless you find that he used more force than was necessary to protect himself." The court gave No. 8, as amended, and refused Nos. 2, 5, and 6. To the amending of said instruction No. 3 as aforesaid, and giving the same as amended, and to the refusal of the court to give each of said instructions Nos. 2, 5, and 6, appellant separately excepted.

Messrs. Samuel H. West and Gaughan & Sifford, for appellant:

If the conductor did use more force than seemed to him necessary for his own protection, the appellant, the master, is not liable in damages.

If the appellee by his own culpable misconduct was the assailant, or provoked the anger of the conductor and unfitted him mentally for discharging his duties as such servant, he, the appellee, cannot recover.

Harrison v. Fink, 42 Fed. Rep. 787; Peary v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 81 Ga. 485.

One detected in an act of the kind in which appellee was engaged is not usually filled with a Christian spirit. The interference by the conductor as a rule will bring the vengeance of the suspect on his head. How unjust to require of him such strict care and then expose him, at the peril of his master, to the taunts, insults, and blows of the evil-minded.

Where one by his own carelessness contributes to an injury inflicted on him by the negligence of another, it will defeat his recovery, even where the act complained of is the neglect of a positive requirement of the statute.

St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Leathers, 62 Ark. 285; St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Dingman, 62 Ark. 245.

On petition for rehearing.

There is sufficient evidence from which the jury could have found that the conductor did not use more force than appeared to him as necessary to protect himself. And if this is true this court should reverse and let the jury decide, under proper instructions.

If the proper instructions had been given to the jury, and this court would not have disturbed the verdict in favor of appellant, on the evidence, then it should not now decide on the weight of evidence and take the case away from the jury.

It is the province of the jury, and not of the appellate court, to weigh the evidence, and determine whether the testimony of a witness is to be believed.

Wilcox v. Boothe, 19 Ark. 684.

A judgment of the lower court will not be reversed upon the weight of evidence if there is any legal evidence upon which the verdict might be found.

Gavin v. Armistead, 57 Ark. 577.

Where there is a conflict of the testimony the supreme court will not disturb the verdict.

Mayson v. Edington, 28 Ark. 208; Bostick v. Brittain, 25 Ark. 482; Bright v. Bostick, 27 Ark. 57; Holt v. State, 47 Ark. 196; Brooks v. Perry, 23 Ark. 32; Berry v. Elliott, 25 Ark. 89; Cogswell v. McKeogh, 46 Ark. 524; Williams v. State, 50 Ark. 511.

Where it was the appropriate province of a jury to determine a matter of fact before them, and their verdict is not without evidence to sustain it, this court will not disturb their finding.

Hirsch v. Patterson, 23 Ark. 112.

A verdict will not be disturbed if there is competent evidence to support it.

Fayetteville & L. R. R. v. Combs, 51 Ark. 324; St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Trigg, 63 Ark. 599.

The court erred in deciding that the burden of showing that the conductor used no more force than was necessary is upon the appellant.

The court erred in deciding the appellant liable for damages, in this case, notwithstanding the conductor may have used more force in repelling the assault of appellee than appeared to him as necessary for his self-defense.

Elliott, Railroads, § 1638; New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. Jones, 142 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 919.

Messrs. Scott & Jones, for appellee:

The resistance must not exceed the bounds of mere defense and prevention, or the force used in defense must not be more than commensurate with that which provoked it.

Webb's Pollock, Torts, p. 255.

If the conductor used more force than seemed to him necessary for his own protection, the appellant, the master, is liable in damages.

Hughes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Briefly the case may be stated as follows: Appellee was a passenger on train of appellant. He was a New York jewelry drummer, and took a seat near a girl of seventeen years, a stranger to him. The conductor removed this girl to the rear of the coach. Appellee said to a friend he would go back and see why the conductor moved this girl. He went back, sat down by the girl, and began inquiring where she was going, and asked her other questions. The conductor looked at him in a manner that convinced him that the conductor, to say the least, was suspicious of his intentions. From this an altercation ensued, in which appellee struck the conductor first, and in turn the conductor struck him, and beat him with a lantern. There was evidence tending to show that the conductor gave the appellee a serious and severe beating with his lantern, and that the appellee was endeavoring to ward off the blows, or protect himself by throwing up his hands; that the brakeman, while this was going on, stood behind the conductor, and twice, when the conductor ceased beating the plaintiff, told him to give him some more; and that thereupon the conductor hit him two more licks. To use his language, "I think he gave him some more twice." The evidence tended to show that the conductor only stopped beating the appellee because he discovered he was a Mason; that the conductor struck several blows,—as many as three to five each time: then he would talk to the plaintiff, and strike him again. The blows were upon the head and shoulders of the plaintiff, who tried to ward them off with his hands. Plaintiff's hat was knocked off, there was a scalp wound, and the blood ran over his face, hands, and clothing. Dr. Webster, who dressed the plaintiff's wounds, testified: "The wounds were on his head, left shoulder, and arms; two or three wounds on the head, his shoulder was pretty badly bruised, and finger pretty badly cut. One of the wounds on his head was about two and a half inches long, cut to the skull. The other one was cut to the skull, but was more of a puncture. It was probably one half inch long. . . . The wound on his finger was quite a gash." On cross-examination he said, "I did not regard his wounds of a serious nature." There was other testimony tending to show that the beating was severe; in fact, very unnecessary to repel the force used by the appellee in slapping the conductor in the face, which, there is proof tending to show, was provoked by the conductor calling the appellee "a son of a bitch."

The appellant contends that by the instructions of the court it was left to the jury to decide whether or not the conductor used more force in repelling the assault of appellee than was necessary to protect himself, and that this was error; that the court should have instructed as appellee asked, that if they found that the conductor used more force than appeared to him necessary, acting as a reasonable man, under the circumstances and surroundings, etc. Conceding that, as an abstract proposition, the contention is well founded, yet the refusal to so instruct in this case could not be prejudicial, as it is plain from the testimony that the conductor did use more force than was reasonably necessary to repel the assault of the appellee. If error, therefore, it is not prejudicial.

The appellant contends that, if the servant is justifiable, under the law, in what he did, the master is not liable. Very true. "When one is wrongfully assaulted it is lawful to repel force by force (as also to use force in the defense of those whom one is bound to protect, or for keeping the peace), provided that no unnecessary violence is used. . . . We must be content to say that the resistance must 'not exceed the bounds of mere defense and prevention,' or that the force used in defense must be not more than 'commensurate' with that which provoked it." Webb's Pollock, Torts, p. 255. We think the burden was on the appellant to show that the conductor used no more force than appeared to him, as a reasonable man, necessary to repel the assault of the appellee. This has not been done. On the contrary, it appears, from the evidence of the appellant, as well as that of the appellee, that the amount of force used by the conductor greatly exceeded that which would appear to any reasonable man to have been necessary to repel the assault made by the appellee upon the conductor by slapping him in the face with his hand.

The appellant also contends that, if the conductor did use more force than seemed to him necessary for his own protection, the appellant (the master) is not liable in damages. To support this contention, they cite Peavy v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 81 Ga. 485 (in which no authority is cited to sustain the opinion), and Harrison v. Fink, 42 Fed. Rep. 787, a case originating in Georgia, to support which Peavy v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. is cited. We cannot yield assent to such a doctrine, which is based upon the ground that the injured party is the aggressor or brings on the difficulty. This would exempt a railroad company from liability in a case where, for a simple assault upon a servant, representing the company, the servant might severely and cruelly beat the assailant, a passenger, whom the law makes it his duty not to abuse or mistreat unnecessarily. The rule applicable to such cases is this: That when a prima facie case of assault and battery is sought to be justified, it is incumbent upon one who justifies to show that no more force was used than the exigencies of the case called for. The force used must be suitable in kind and degree to the exigencies of the occasion; otherwise, the justification fails. Hanson v. European & N. A. R. Co. 62 Me. 84, 16 Am. Rep. 404; Dillingham v. Anthony, 73 Tex. 47, 3 L. R. A. 634.

There are objections based on language used in argument by appellee's counsel, which was, perhaps, not altogether proper, but we think the case ought not to be reversed on account of it. We do not think it probable that the jury was misled or prejudiced by it. We cannot say that there was an abuse of discretion by the trial court. The verdict was for $700 actual damages, which we do not think excessive.

Upon the whole case, finding no reversible error, the judgment is affirmed.

Bunn, Ch. J., dissenting:

The statement of the facts in this case, as detailed by the young lady involved, presents the plaintiff in a very different attitude from that in which his own testimony presents him, and the conductor's testimony puts quite a different phase on his use of unnecessary force to repel the assault from that made to appear in plaintiff's testimony. But, since no testimony, antecedent to the assault on the conductor by the plaintiff, ought to have any influence upon our decision on the question raised by the instructions called in question, and 39 L. R. A.

since, in discussing those instructions, it must be conceded, for the sake of the argument, at least, that there was unnecessary force employed by the conductor in repelling the assault upon himself by the passenger, I forbear to make any particular statement of the facts.

The question at issue arises upon instructions given and instructions refused and instructions modified, and, briefly stated, is this: "Where a passenger assaults the conductor of the train in which he is traveling, and the latter, in resenting it, uses more force than is necessary to repel the assault, is the company liable for damages occasioned by the employment of the excessive force?" The authorities cited by a majority of the court in support of their view of the question involved, are Webb's Pollock, Torts, pp. 255, 256; Hanson v. European & N. A. R. Co. 62 Me. 84, 16 Am. Rep. 404, and Dillingham v. Anthony, 73 Tex. 47, 3 L. R. A. 634, and these I will endeavor to analyze and discuss in the order named.

In the first,—a text book,—under the heading of "Self-Defense," it is stated: "When one is wrongfully assaulted, it is lawful to repel force by force (as also to use force in the defense of those whom one is bound to protect, or for keeping the peace), provided that no unnecessary violence is used." [Webb's Pollock, Torts, p. 255]. How much force, and what kind, it is reasonable and proper to use in the circumstances, must always be a question of fact; and, as it is incapable of being concluded beforehand by authority, so we do not find any decisions which attempt a definition. We must be content to say that the resistance must "not exceed the bounds of mere prevention," or that the force used in defense must be not more than "commensurate" with that which provoked it. It is obvious, however, that the matter is of much graver importance in criminal than in civil law. It is generally held that the rule on the subject is not exactly the same in civil as in criminal actions, and the statement of the author is but the statement of the rule in criminal actions. Moreover, the rule as stated only reaches the direct and immediate actor, and has nothing to say as to the duty or liability of a third party, holding, for instance, the relation of master or employer to the prime actor. The authority, therefore, is not applicable to the case in issue, and it states nothing that is inconsistent with what I have to say, or with the authorities I shall take occasion to cite.

Hanson v. European & N. A. R. Co. 62 Me. 84, 16 Am. Rep. 404, was a case where a brakeman was attempting to put off the coach a dog belonging to the plaintiff, a passenger; it being against the rules to carry dogs on the coach. The brakeman attempted, in rather a rude and uncereemonious manner, to put the dog off, and this gave rise to a difficulty between the plaintiff and the brakeman, in which the former rather rudely pushed the latter down into a seat, and the latter, stretching out his legs, kicked the plaintiff, breaking the pane of glass behind him in doing so, but failed to release himself by so doing from the grasp of the former. When the plaintiff had finally released the brakeman, under promise that the latter should behave himself, and while the plaintiff's back was turned, the brakeman struck him severe blows with a poker about the head and shoulders and over the eye, which constituted the assault and battery for which the suit was brought. In that case the court said: "If, therefore, it be true, as defendants contend, that the plaintiff was the aggressor,—that he first assaulted the brakeman, and resisted him in the performance of a legitimate duty—it was still a question of fact, for the jury to determine, whether the brakeman did not use greater violence than the exigencies of the case demanded; whether he did not pursue the plaintiff, and inflict the blows upon his head with the iron poker, after the latter had ceased his assault, had ceased his resistance, and was returning to his seat with his back to the brakeman." In that case the servant was within the line of his employment and duty in attempting to put the dog off the coach. In doing so, he became involved in difficulty with the plaintiff—the owner of the dog—which at first extended no further than the act of plaintiff in pushing or pulling the brakeman down into his seat, and the latter kicking the former by stretching out his legs, or in the act of so doing, for the record is not clear on that point. The scuffle seems to have ended at this point, on the plaintiff's promise to the brakeman that he would let him up if he would afterwards behave himself, which agreement the brakeman assented to and was released; but, as soon as he could slyly do so, he seized the iron poker, and badly beat the plaintiff. The first difficulty having closed, the brakeman became the aggressor and assaulting party in the latter. Whatever name the court may employ to designate this character of assault on the part of the servant, it was not in self-defense, and therefore it was done while in the line of his employment, and done in violation of his and his master's duty to the passenger. And such was the theory upon which the court decided the case. We have no quarrel with the decision on the facts of the case, however wanting in precision its language may be.

In Dillingham v. Anthony, 73 Tex. 47, 8 L. R. A. 634, the much-mooted question was whether or not the malicious and wilful assault of a conductor upon one of his passengers, in a personal controversy between the two, disconnected from any duty of the conductor as such, rendered the railway company liable. The court held the company liable upon the facts of that case, but not for exemplary damages. It was manifest that the court took the side of the long-standing controversy to the effect that the malice and wilfulness of the servant in making an assault upon the passenger did not excuse the master from liability, since the latter owed a duty to the passenger, that of protection, which, through his servant, he had violated. I have no desire to enter upon that threadbare discussion, since the question is not presented in this record.

In Harrison v. Fink, 42 Fed. Rep. 787, the doctrines of which the court repudiates, as well as Peavy v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 81 Ga. 485, upon which it is founded, the court said, quoting from Peavy v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co.: "Did he [the plaintiff] have a cause of action for the shooting? But for his fault, the conductor would not have been brought into a state of excitement, from danger and insult, 39 L. R. A.

which unfitted him for discharging his proper duties, either to the company or to the passenger. Whether the conductor was more or less in fault than the plaintiff was in shooting, certainly the plaintiff was more in fault than the company, because the plaintiff was there upon the ground, stirring up excitement, and bringing on danger both to the conductor and himself. He unfitted the conductor for exercising the care and prudence that were essential to guarding the interest of the company, and essential to performing in a proper manner his duty to the company or to the plaintiff. The plaintiff spoiled the instrument, and then sued the manager because the performer did not make good music. It was the plaintiff's fault that the conductor was out of tune, and, though the conductor might not be altogether excusable for the shooting (according to his own evidence, however, he was excusable), the company was not in fault for it; and it would be unjust for the plaintiff to recover of the company, when he boarded its train, violating the law, as we can well infer, by carrying upon his person a concealed weapon, violating the law again by swearing and using obscene language, violating the law again by committing an assault upon the conductor with a pistol, drawing the pistol, and presenting it at him, and violating the law by general disorder and misconduct throughout the transaction, up to the moment he was shot." And, continuing, the Federal Court said: "This quotation expresses very clearly, in our opinion, the correct rule on this subject."

Why the doctrine asserted in those cases failed to receive the sanction of the majority we do not see; for it is a doctrine now generally held, I believe, that a passenger who so acts as to disqualify a servant from properly performing his duty to his master and to the public by assaulting him and causing him to resort to whatever present means of self-defense he may have, ought not to be heard to complain of the consequences. This is the doctrine held in City Electric R. Co. v. Shropshire (Ga.) 28 S. E. 508, in which Judge Lumpkin, speaking for the supreme court of Georgia, said: "One who voluntarily, and by his own misconduct, places it beyond the power of a master to protect him [that is, by disqualifying his servant] surely cannot complain of an omission so to do." The same principle is announced in Scott v. Central Park, N. & E. River R. Co. 58 Hun, 414. This last case is authority for saying that, while in criminal law words do not justify an assault, so far as the party making an assault is concerned, there is no reason for holding that the carrier should be held responsible when a passenger, by his own improper and insulting behavior while a passenger on the road of the railroad company brought upon himself an assault.

I come now to consider what will be regarded as conduct not within the line of his employment on the part of a servant. Some of the cases already cited throw light on this question, but it may be well to consider others. In Little Miami R. Co. v. Wetmore, 19 Ohio St. 133, 2 Am. Rep. 373, the supreme court of Ohio said: "The evidence of the company as the trial tended strongly to prove that the plaintiff, by his importunate conduct and abusive language towards the servant, provoked a personal quarrel between them; that the assault was the result of this quarrel, and that the blow was inflicted by the servant as an act of personal resentment. If these facts had been found by the jury, the wrongful act of the servant in striking the plaintiff could not be regarded as authorized by the master, nor as an act done by the servant in the execution of the service for which he was engaged by the master. The fact that the blow was inflicted with a hatchet furnished by the master to be used for a wholly different purpose, though in connection with the servant's business, was wholly immaterial as respects the liability of the master. If he would not otherwise have been liable for the assault, the fact that it was committed with his hatchet did not contribute to make him so." In New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. Jones, 142 U. S. 25, 35 L. ed. 924, the Supreme Court of the United States, after discussing the rule which governs in cases where a conductor removes a passenger from the coach for misconduct, goes on to say: "But if an employee may use force to protect other passengers, so he may to protect himself. He has not forfeited his right to self-defense by assuming service with a common carrier; nor does the common carrier engage against the exercise of that right by his employee. There is no misconduct when a conductor uses force and does injury in simply self-defense; and the rules which determine what is self-defense are of universal application, and are not affected by the character of the employment in which the party is engaged. Indeed, while the courts hold that the liability of a common carrier to his passengers for the assaults of his employee is of a most stringent character, far greater than that of ordinary employers for the actions of their employees, yet they all limit the liability to cases in which the assault and injury are wrongful." The idea is that, where the servant leaves the line of his employment to attend to his own affair,—defend himself against the assault of a passenger,—he is, nevertheless, doing a lawful act, and neither he nor his master is liable. In Little Miami R. Co. v. Wetmore, 19 Ohio St. 131, 2 Am. Rep. 373, in speaking of the master's responsibility for the acts of the servant, the court said: "But, to make the master responsible, the act of the servant must be done in the course of his employment; that is, under the express or implied authority of the master. Beyond the scope of his employment, the servant is as much a stranger to his master as any third person, and the act of the servant not done in the execution of the service for which he was engaged cannot be regarded as the act of the master."

It is impossible to get the full force of this decision by mere quotations and making extracts therefrom. Nor is it possible to do so in any case. I can only invite the reader to an examination of the cases I have cited and merely made quotations and extracts from, and I feel confident that, without a jar or discordant note anywhere, they all amply sustain the doctrine that lawful self-defense on the part of a conductor entails no liability upon him, and of course, none upon the company; that such defense, as its definition implies, is a matter personal to himself, and is something he neither engages to make or not to make in whatever employment he may enter; that it is therefore not within any employment he may make, being a natural right which he can neither surrender, nor qualify by any contractual act; and that, in making a self-defense, he is not directed or influenced in the same by any lawful engagement whatever with another. If the servant, by lawful assault, in response to an assault upon his own person, is not within the line of employment to any master, can it be said that continuing his defense, to the extent of using more and greater force than is necessary to repel the assault and force his antagonist to desist, will have the effect of bringing him back into the line of his employment. The absurdity of such a proposition renders a discussion of it more or less insulting to even the most generous and patient reader. All the cases in which the master has been held liable for the use of excessive force by the servant are cases where the servant was acting in the line of his duty to and employment by the master, and most frequently illustrating the conduct of conductors and other servants in putting off the train passengers and others who refuse to pay fare, or are guilty of misconduct such as renders them liable to be put off; for the ejecting of disorderly persons is one of the express duties of the conductor, not only to the railroad company, but to the public and to the law of the land.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY,
Appl.,
v.
FLEMMING & COMPANY.

(.....Ark.....)

1. Benzine kept bottled in small quantities as part of a stock of drugs and chemicals does not avoid a policy on such a stock, although there is a stipulation against keeping benzine in the store.
2. An insurer's demand of an exhibition of the books of the insured and of proofs of loss is not a waiver of any condition of the policy, where it provides for the right to make an examination of the books and that this shall not be treated as a waiver of any condition.
3. An adjuster's insistence upon strict proofs of loss, made in reply to a question if other proofs are necessary, does not waive any forfeiture that may have occurred.
4. The fact that fireworks were on exhibition in a store when a policy of insurance was issued on the stock, or that one of a firm of agents which issued the policy soon after purchased fireworks at the store, is insufficient to show knowledge of the agent when issuing the policy that fireworks were kept in stock.

NOTE.—For keeping fireworks as breach of contract of insurance, see also Heron v. Phoenix Mut. F. Ins. Co. (Pa.) 86 L. R. A. 517.

5. An insurance agent's knowledge, acquired while attending to his own affairs, of the fact that fireworks are kept in an insured stock of goods, must have been present in his mind when the policy was issued, or some act done in the course of his duties as agent recognizing the continued validity of the policy, in order to make a waiver of a condition against keeping such articles.

6. A general objection is not sufficient to raise the point that an instruction is slightly defective in form and may be misunderstood.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Phillips County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Reversed.

Statement by Riddick, J.:

Action upon an insurance policy issued by the defendant, the Phoenix Insurance Company, upon a stock of merchandise owned by plaintiffs for the sum of $1,500. The presiding judge, at the trial in the circuit court, among other instructions, gave to the jury the following, at the request of the plaintiffs, to which the defendant objected: "(3) And even if the agent did not have such notice, or give plaintiffs permission to keep these articles, still, if you find from the evidence introduced that after the loss by fire defendant's agent was informed of these facts, and with full knowledge thereof required plaintiffs to exhibit to him their books of account, and demanded of them proofs of loss, as prescribed by the policy, and in pursuance of these demands plaintiffs did produce to them their books, and afterwards made out, at inconvenience and expense, proofs of their loss for defendant, in that event a forfeiture of the policy, if there was one, was waived by defendant, and plaintiffs are entitled to a verdict on that issue. The reason of this rule of law is that, as soon as an insurance company ascertains the facts which they claim cause a forfeiture of the policy, it is their duty to notify the plaintiffs that they deny all liability under the policy, and, if they fail to do so, but insist on proofs of loss, or examining his affairs, and putting to trouble and expense, the law estops them from afterwards claiming such forfeiture." There was a verdict and judgment against the insurance company.

Messrs. John J. Horner and E. C. Horner, for appellant:

If the agent agreed with the appellees that they could keep such hazardous articles, appellees should have refused to accept a policy in which it was expressly stipulated that they should not keep them.

Germania Ins. Co. v. Bromwell, 62 Ark. 43.

It was the duty of the appellees to read their contract of insurance.

The policy issued by the insurance company is the contract. The insured must bring himself within its terms. Compliance therewith is a condition precedent to recovery.

The first act of the adjuster was to obtain an agreement of nonwaiver. As soon as this nonwaiver was executed the adjuster announced that the policy was of no validity by reason of the violation of the agreement relative to fireworks.

It is certainly within the province of the insurance company to say what character of articles it will permit kept in the stock, and what it will prohibit, and to incorporate such agreement in the policy so that there may be no doubt as to the understanding. If the assured is unwilling to accept the contract, and violates it by keeping upon the premises such articles as are prohibited, he must suffer the consequences of the violation of his agreement.

If appellant's agent ever knew any facts which would bring home to him notice of the violation of a condition of the contract it was while engaged in making a purchase which pertained solely to his private affairs.

Riddick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action upon a fire insurance policy to recover the value of property insured which had been destroyed by fire. The property is described in the written portion of the policy as a "stock of merchandise, consisting of drugs, stationary, liquors, tobacco, toys and fancy articles, paints, oils, chemicals, and such other goods, not more hazardous, such as is usually kept for sale in a drug store." The printed portion of the policy stipulated that the policy should be void if benzine or fireworks were kept, unless by agreement indorsed on the policy. No such agreement was indorsed upon the policy, and the evidence showed that both benzine and fireworks were kept in the store of plaintiffs. The insurance company contends that this avoided the policy. As to the benzine, only a small quantity was kept in the store. This was put up in bottles containing from two to six ounces each, to be sold to ladies for the purpose of cleansing gloves. It amounted to about a gallon in all. The testimony showed that it was customary for druggists to keep benzine bottled in small quantities, to be sold for such purposes, and that as one witness stated, "a drug store without it would be incomplete." The question arises whether this benzine was not included in the written description of the property insured, for, if it was a part of the property insured, it follows as a matter of course that its presence in the store did not avoid the policy. The written portion of the policy insuring the benzine as a part of the stock of merchandise would override the printed portion, forbidding it to be kept. To hold otherwise would make the contract mean, in effect, that the company contracted to take pay and insure the owner of this benzine against its destruction by fire, but only on condition that no benzine was kept. The courts will not presume that the parties intended to make such an absurd agreement, but in such a case will presume that the intention was that the printed portions of the policy, forbidding the keeping of benzine, should not apply to the keeping of it bottled in small quantities, as customary with druggists, but only to storing or keeping it in large quantities. Faust v. American F. Ins. Co. 91 Wis. 158, 30 L. R. A. 783; Mears v. Humboldt Ins. Co. 92 Pa. 15, 87 Am. Rep. 647; Hall v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 58 N. Y. 292, 17 Am. Rep. 255; Pindar v. King's County F. Ins. Co. 36 N. Y. 648, 93 Am. Dec. 544; Harper v. Albany Mut. Ins. Co. 17 N. Y. 197; Archer v. Merchants & Mfrs. Ins. Co. 43 Mo. 434; Cushman v. Northwestern Ins. Co. 34 Me. 487.

Now, the property insured is described as a stock of merchandise consisting, among other things, of "drugs" and "chemicals." The word "drug" is defined as any animal or mineral substance used in the composition of medicines; any stuff used in dyeing or in chemical operations; any ingredient used in chemical preparations employed in the arts. Webster Dict.; Century Dict. The term "chemical" is defined as a substance used for producing a chemical effect, or one produced by a chemical process; a chemical agent prepared for scientific or economic use. Webster Dict.; Century Dict. The definition of "benzine" given in Webster's International Dictionary is: "A liquid consisting mainly of the lighter and more volatile hydrocarbons of petroleum or kerosene oil, used as a solvent and for cleansing soiled fabrics." It is used in the arts as a solvent for fats, resins, and certain alkaloids. Century Dict. Without going into a discussion of the scientific or exact meaning of these terms, we will say that, in our opinion, benzine kept in the quantities and for the purposes that the proof shows that it was kept by plaintiffs, was included in the terms "drugs" and "chemicals," used in describing the property insured. As the company writes the policy, the rule is to resolve doubts arising as to its meaning in favor of the assured. Jones v. Southern Ins. Co. 38 Fed. Rep. 19. Benzine put up in small quantities was a part of the stock asked to be insured. Bottled and corked in such quantities, it was probably not more dangerous than other chemicals. It was not necessary to give the particular name of each drug or chemical, or other article that went to make up the entire stock, and the company, in describing the property insured, has chosen to use general terms, which we think fairly include the benzine in the stock. For these reasons we are of the opinion that the policy was not avoided by the fact that benzine was kept bottled in small quantities as a part of the stock of drugs and chemicals. The agents of the appellant company seem to have been of this opinion also, for, after the fire, when they had examined the books, and knew the facts, they stated to plaintiffs that their policy was void because they kept fireworks, but said nothing of the benzine.

Was the policy avoided by the fact that fireworks were kept in plaintiffs' store? We will first notice the contention made by plaintiffs that the forfeiture, if any existed, was waived by a demand made on the part of the company after knowledge that fireworks were kept in the store, that plaintiffs should exhibit their books, and make out proof of loss. The policy provided that, in case of loss, the company should have the right to make an examination of the books of account kept by the assured, and that such examination should not be treated or considered as a waiver of any condition of the policy, or of any forfeiture thereof. For this reason the demand for the books and the examination thereof cannot, we think, be treated as a waiver of the conditions of the policy. After finding from an examination of the books that fireworks had been kept, the adjuster of the company stated to plaintiffs that their policy was void because fireworks were kept; but he offered to settle by compromise, and they made an agreement to appraise the goods, it being stipulated therein that such agreement and appraisal should not waive any of the conditions of the policy. After the appraisement, the adjuster again told the plaintiffs that their policy was void, and that the company would resist any effort to collect it by action at law, but offered to pay another sum in compromise. This offer being refused, the adjuster said that he would leave on the first boat for Memphis. He was thereupon interrogated by one of the counsel for plaintiffs as follows: "Mr. Boyd, in behalf of these companies you represent, you have had the books, and have gone through them. Do you require any further proofs of loss, or are you satisfied with everything?" to which Boyd replied, "We shall insist upon strict proof of loss under the terms of the policy." Now, the positive denial of liability, and the assertion of the agent that the policy was void because fireworks were kept, may have been a waiver of proof of loss, but we do not think that the forfeiture, if any had occurred, was waived by the reply of the agent quoted above. By the terms of the policy the assured agreed to furnish proof of loss, and agreed that the loss should not be payable until such proof was furnished. Unless proof of loss was waived, the assured had no right of action against the company until the same was furnished, and, in order to determine whether the company would waive such proof, or for some other reason, the attorney for appellee propounded the above question. What the agent said was in reply to this question, and, when taken in connection with his previous assertion that the policy was void, and that the company would resist its enforcement, meant, in our opinion, nothing more than that the company did not intend to waive proof of loss. In a recent case decided by the court of appeals of New York it was said that "the rule is now established, however, that if in any negotiations or transactions with the assured after knowledge of the forfeiture, it [the company] recognizes the continued validity of the policy, or does acts based thereon, or requires the insured to do some act or incur some trouble or expense, the forfeiture is waived." The court further said that, "while the later decisions all hold that such waiver need not be based upon a technical estoppel, in all cases where this question is presented where there has been no express waiver, the fact is recognized that there exist the elements of an estoppel." Armstrong v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 130 N. Y. 560. This seems to be a correct statement of the law upon this question. German Ins. Co. v. Gibson, 53 Ark. 494. Now, it will be noticed that the agent here made no demand or request that the assured should furnish proof of loss. He said nothing from which the assured could infer that, if such proof was furnished, the loss would be paid. It cannot be legitimately inferred from his reply, above quoted, that he intended to recognize the validity of the policy, for he had previously stated that the policy was void, nor was such reply calculated to mislead the assured in any way, and it cannot be taken as a waiver of the forfeiture, if any existed. We are therefore of the opinion that it was improper for the presiding judge to submit the question arising on this point to the jury, as he did in the third instruction given on the trial. While such an instruction might be properly given under a different state of facts, yet in this case there was no evidence upon which to base such an instruction, and it was calculated to mislead, and was prejudicial to appellants.

But it is further contended by plaintiffs that there could have been no forfeiture of the policy on the ground that fireworks were kept, for the reason, as they contend, that the agent of the company who issued the policy knew at the time it was issued that fireworks were kept in stock by plaintiffs, and that the issuance of the policy under such circumstances was a waiver of the condition forbidding fireworks to be kept. We will proceed to consider the evidence bearing on that point, for, if the proof was conclusive that the agent of appellant knew at the time he issued the policy that fireworks were kept in the store of assured, it would be presumed that the condition forbidding the keeping of such fireworks was waived, and the error above noticed would be harmless. It is now too well settled to require discussion that the issuance of a policy of insurance with knowledge of facts which, by the terms of the policy, render it void, will be treated as a waiver of such ground of forfeiture. Dwelling House Ins. Co. v. Brodte, 52 Ark. 11, 4 L. R. A. 458. And this is true even though the policy contains a stipulation that the conditions of the policy shall not be waived by any officer or agent of the company unless such waiver be indorsed upon the policy. It is a general rule of law that the parties to a written contract may afterwards change or alter such contract by a parol agreement to that effect, and contracts with insurance companies furnish no exception to this rule. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Public Parks Amusement Co., 63 Ark. 187; Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. Earle, 83 Mich. 148; 2 Beach, Ins. § 787. The facts bearing on this point are as follows: The policy in question was issued by R. H. Crutcher & Co., a firm composed of R. H. Crutcher and one Friborg. This firm was the agent of the defendant company, and, in order to show that these agents knew at the time the policy was issued that fireworks were kept in the store, J. H. Flemming, one of the plaintiffs, was sworn as a witness. After stating that the policy was issued by Crutcher & Co. he was asked the following question: "Please state whether, at the time they issued this policy of insurance, they had notice and knew the fact that you kept fireworks for sale and on hand in that store," to which he replied: "This policy was issued on the 24th day of December, I believe, at a time when our stock of fireworks was very large, and on exhibition; and Mr. Friborg bought fireworks from me during that Christmas, and knew we had them for sale." Now, no express waiver of the condition forbidding the keeping of fireworks is claimed, and, in order that a waiver of such condition may be implied from the issuance of the policy, it must be shown that it was issued with knowledge on the part of the agent that fireworks were kept, and the burden of proof to show this is on the plaintiffs. But the witness, in the answer above quoted, which was all the testimony on this point, does not show that the agent had such knowledge at the time the policy was issued. It does not necessarily follow from the fact that fireworks were on exhibition, or that one of the agents, after the policy was issued, purchased fireworks at the store, that the agent issuing the policy knew of the presence of such fireworks. The fact that one of the agents went to the store shortly after the policy was issued to purchase fireworks is a circumstance tending to show that he knew that fireworks were kept there, but the witness does not say that this member of the firm issued the policy. The agent of the insurance company was a partnership, and each member of the firm could act for the firm, and issue the policy. If in the course of the negotiations for this policy, and before it was issued, plaintiffs had notified either member of the firm that they kept fireworks in their store this would have been notice to the company, and it would have been bound; but no such notice was given. The knowledge of the fireworks shown here was acquired by the agent, not while acting for the company or his firm, but casually, while attending to his own affairs. To make this knowledge affect the company, it must be shown that the agent afterwards, with this information present in his mind issued the policy, or consented to its issuance, or did some act in the course of his duties as agent recognizing the continuing validity of the policy. The Distilled Spirits Case, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 356, 20 L. ed. 167. But this was not shown, or at least it was not so conclusively shown as to justify us in saying as a matter of law that the knowledge of the agent was established. We cannot, therefore, say that the error heretofore noticed was harmless, for the jury may not have found that the agent issuing the policy had notice of the fireworks, and may have based their verdict upon a belief that the forfeiture was waived by the statement of the adjuster that the company would insist upon strict proof of loss under the terms of the policy.

Several other rulings of the court have been called to our attention and considered, but, except as above stated, we do not discover that the court committed any material error.

We agree with counsel for appellant that instruction No. 2 given by the presiding judge is slightly defective in form, and it is possible that it might be misunderstood. We feel sure that, if the attention of the judge had been called to the defect, it would have been corrected. It does not appear that his attention was called to it, or that appellant, during the trial in the circuit court, objected to the instruction on that ground, and a general objection is not sufficient to raise such a question in this court.

For the error indicated, the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

NORWALK STREET RAILWAY COMPANY'S APPEAL.

(69 Conn. 576.)

1. The incapacity of the legislature to execute a power which is essentially and merely a judicial power, and of the judiciary to execute a power which is essentially and merely a legislative power, as well as the limitation of the meaning of legislative power by force of certain primary principles of government fairly embodied in the Constitution, and by the necessities involved in the separation and independence of distinct departments of government, is fundamental to the very existence of constitutional government as established in the United States.

2. A superior court or judge thereof cannot validly exercise a power which is not "a judicial power" within the meaning of the Constitution.

3. An original application to a superior court or judge thereof for the approval and adoption or modification of a plan for the location and construction of a street railway, including the determination of the streets to be occupied and the location as to grade and center line of the street, as well as changes to be made in the street or kind and quality of track to be used, the motive power and method of applying it, does not call for the exercise of a judicial power within the meaning of the Constitution, although the application is called an appeal and is made after the refusal or neglect of local authorities to give notice of their decision on the plan within sixty days after it is presented to them; and this is by statute deemed to be a refusal on their part to approve and accept the plan.

(Baldwin, J., dissents.)

(July 13, 1897.)

APPeAL by the City of Norwalk from a judgment of the Superior Court for Fairfield County establishing a plan for the location and construction of a railway in some of the city streets. Reversed.

Statement by Hamersley, J.:

The petition in this case represents that on April 4, 1896, the Norwalk Street Railway Company presented a plan for the location and construction of its railroad in the streets of the city of Norwalk, to the mayor and council of said city, and that the mayor and council failed to notify the petitioners, within sixty days of that date, in writing, of their decision upon said plan, and asks the judge to accept or modify the same as he might deem equitable. Due service of the petition was made. Upon the hearing, the mayor and council moved that the "appeal" be dismissed, "because the questions raised by this appeal involve only the consideration and determination of matters not of a judicial character, and the tribunal to which the appeal is taken has no jurisdiction to hear and determine any matters except those of a judicial character." This motion was denied, and the judge rendered a judgment accepting and adopting a plan (being the plan presented to the mayor and council, modified in some respects) for the location and construction of the railroad. The only questions raised by the assignment of errors, and pressed in argument, were: Can the "superior court or a judge thereof" validly exercise a power which is not a "judicial power," within the meaning of the Constitution? Was the action of the judge in this case an exercise of such judicial power?

Messrs. Goodwin Stoddard and Edward M. Lockwood, for the City:

The Federal Constitution and the Constitutions of all the states contain a provision calculated and intended to assign the functions of government to three separate and distinct departments: the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. This provision is regarded as fundamental.

The Federalist, Nos. 47, 78, 81; Cooley, Const. Lim. 44; 3 Daniel Webster's Works, p. 29; Hayburn's Case, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 409, 1 L. ed. 436; United States v. Ferreira, 54 U. S. 13 How. 40, 14 L. ed. 42; Re Senate of the State, 10 Minn. 78.

Even if, by the unusual condition prevailing in Connecticut, the legislature is vested with some powers properly belonging to another department, nevertheless, in other respects, the principles underlying constitutional government are in force, and prevent the imposition of nonjudicial duties upon the courts

Starr v. Pease, 8 Conn. 547; Day v. Cutler, 22 Conn. 625; Wheeler's Appeal, 45 Conn. 306; Brown v. O'Connell, 86 Conn. 432, 4 Am. Rep. 89.

The functions of the three departments of government are clearly defined in:

Wayman v. Southard, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 46, 6 L. ed. 263; Greenough v. Greenough, 11 Pa. 489, 51 Am. Dec. 567; Hawkins v. The Governor, 1 Ark. 591, 33 Am. Dec. 346; Cooley, Const. Lim. 111, 115; Bates v. Kimball, 2 D. Chip. (Vt.) 77; Merrill v. Sherburne, 1 N. H. 199, 8 Am. Dec. 52; Taylor v. Place, 4 R. I. 324; Auditor of State v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 6 Kan. 500, 7 Am. Rep. 575.

Instances of legislative attempts to force nonjudicial duties upon the courts have been somewhat infrequent. The usual breach of the constitutional provisions has been by an assumption of power, and not by attempted delegation to an unwilling judiciary. But the question has at times arisen in the same form as in the present suit.

In another class of cases the legislature has attempted to delegate the power of taxation. This is, of course, plainly a legislative function.

The duties required of the court in hearing an appeal under this act are not judicial, nor to be performed in a judicial manner, and the act is therefore unconstitutional and void.

Messrs. John W. Alling and George D. Watrous, for the Railway Company:

The general argument which supports the proposition of the city is, that the three departments of the government, the legislative, executive, and judicial, are distinct, separate, and independent of each other; and that the assumption of any of the powers appropriate to one is an unconstitutional invasion of the province peculiar to one of the others. If this proposition be true, and the argument sound, no duty of any kind could be imposed by law upon a judge, which is not strictly judicial in its nature.

Starr v. Pease, 8 Conn. 547; Wheeler's Appeal, 35 Conn. 306; People, Smith, v. Twelfth Dist. Judge, 17 Cal. 548.

In its last analysis the distinction between executive and judicial officers is lost in metaphysics.

2 Eaton's Cyclopædia of Political Science, p. 640.

A judge will be none the less a judicial officer because some duties he may have to perform are administrative in their character; nor will an administrative become a judicial officer simply because some acts which he may be required to perform may be to some extent judicial in their character.

Waldo v. Wallace, 12 Ind. 583; Mills v. Brooklyn, 32 N. Y. 497; Den, Murray, v. Hoboken Land & Improv. Co. 59 U. S. 18 How. 290, 15 L. ed. 378; Re District Attorney, 28 Fed. Rep. 26.

The power involved in the case at bar is certainly not legislative.

Wolfe v. McCaull, 76 Va. 880.

The real question involved in cases of this character would seem to be this: Do public convenience and necessity require the construction of the railroad according to the plan submitted by the company, or otherwise? This question is pre-eminently a judicial one, and our statutes and reports contain numerous instances of the exercise of such powers by the superior court. This question ought to be regarded as no longer open for discussion in this state.

Hamersley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The act of 1895* confers upon city councils certain powers in establishing regulations for the location, construction, and operation of street railways, and requires a council, if requested by a railway company, to take some action within sixty days, and to notify the company in writing of its action. Whenever a council fails to give such written notice, the act of 1895† confers the same powers upon the "superior court or any judge thereof," to be exercised on application of a railway com-

*Pub. Acts 1893, chap. 169, provides as follows: "Sec. 2. Whenever any railway company shall have been chartered by the general assembly of this state for the purpose of operating street railways in any town, city, or borough, or whenever any such corporation already organized has been or shall be given the right to lay additional tracks in any such town, city, or borough, or whenever any street railway company shall desire to change its motive power, before such company shall proceed to construct such railway, lay additional tracks, or change its motive power, it shall cause a plan to be made showing the highway or highways, street or streets, in and through which it proposes to lay its tracks, the location of the same as to grade and to the center line of said streets or highways, such change, or changes, if any, as are proposed to be made in any street or highway, the kind and quality of track to be used, and the method of laying the same, the motive power to be used in propelling its cars, and the method and manner of applying the same, which said plan shall be presented to the mayor and court of common council of any such city, the selectmen of any such town, or the warden and burgesses of any such borough within their respective jurisdictions, who shall thereupon, upon public notice, proceed to a hearing of all persons interested therein, and after such hearings may accept and adopt such plan, or make such modifications therein, as to them shall seem proper, and shall within sixty days after the presentation of such plan to the local authorities, notify said company in writing of their decision thereon, and of such modifications therein as they may deem proper. The refusal or neglect of any such local authority to notify said company of its decision within said period of sixty days as aforesaid shall be deemed to be a refusal to approve and accept said plan as presented by said company. Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to prevent such street-railway company from presenting to such local authorities a plan or plans as heretofore provided, until said street-railway company and local authorities shall agree upon the same, and no such company shall construct such railway, lay additional tracks, or change its motive power except in accordance with a plan approved by the authorities aforesaid."

†Pub. Acts 1895, chap. 283, provides as follows: "Sec. 1. Whenever the warden and burgesses of any borough, the mayor and common council of any city, or the selectmen of any town, shall make, pass, or render any decision, denial, order, or direction with respect to any matters relating to street railways which, by virtue of any public or private act or resolution, now are, or may hereafter be, within the respective jurisdictions of such warden and burgesses, mayor and common council, or selectmen, any street-railway company affected thereby may appeal from any such decision, pany, and calls this application an "appeal." The power so conferred on the court is described in the act of 1893 as the power to approve and adopt a location and lay out a street railway, with such modifications therein as shall seem proper, in respect to the streets to be occupied, the location of the same as to grade and to the center line of the streets, and changes to be made in the street, the kind and quality of the track to be used, the motive power to be used, and the method of applying the same. Can such powers be conferred on the superior court? The limitation of their exercise to cases where there has been a prior failure of the municipal board to act cannot affect the principle involved. If the legislature can confer the power in a limited class of cases by calling an original application for its exercise an "appeal," it can confer the power in all cases without limitation.

This court has said in Brown v. O'Connell, 36 Conn. 432, 446, 4 Am. Rep. 89: "No judicial power is vested by the Constitution in the general assembly, either directly or as an incident of the legislative power, and the general assembly cannot confer it. . . . It was one of the objects which the people had in view, in framing and adopting the Constitution, to divest the general assembly of all judicial power. . . . While the entire legislative power is vested in the general assembly, the judicial power is separated from it, and vested in the courts 'as a separate magistracy.' It is obvious . . . that the judicial power is not conferred by the general assembly, but vests, by force of the Constitution, in the courts. . . . It was therefore competent for them [the legislature] to provide for the organization of the court in question [a city police court], and to define the jurisdiction it should possess; and, when so constituted, the judicial power of the state vested in it, by force of the Constitution, to the extent of the jurisdiction so defined." In an opinion by Judges Hinman, Sanford, Butler, and Dutton, the Constitution is thus defined: "The Constitution of the state, framed by a convention elected for that purpose, and adopted by the people, embodies their supreme original will in respect to the organization and perpetuation of a state government, the division and distribution of its powers; the officers by whom those powers are to be exercised; and the limitations necessary to restrain the action of each and all for the preservation of the rights, liberties, and privileges of all; and is therefore the supreme and paramount law, to which the legislative, as well as every other branch of the government, and every officer in the performance of his duties, must conform. Whatever that supreme original will prescribes, the general assembly, and every officer or citizen to whom the mandate is addressed must do; and whatever it prohibits, the general assembly and every officer and citizen must refrain from doing; and if either attempt to do that which is prescribed in any other manner than that prescribed or to do in any manner that which is prohibited, their action is repugnant to that supreme and paramount law, and invalid."

Opinion of the Judges, 30 Conn. 593

It is claimed that Wheeler's Appeal, 45 Conn. 313, recognizes a sovereign power in the legislature, not derived from the Constitution, in addition to that embraced in the grant of legislative power, and unrestrained by the division of the powers of government into distinct departments; and this case is relied on as justifying the legislation now in question. It is unnecessary to discuss the precise point determined by the judgment in Wheeler's Appeal, but the ground on which the opinion seeks to justify the judgment is erroneous. It is this: The opinion says it is "obvious from the past history of our own jurisprudence and long-continued legislative practice that we have reserved a much larger field for legislative action than has ever been recognized" in other states. This divergence is due "in part, perhaps principally, to the very extensive powers which were originally conferred on the general assembly by the charter of Connecticut. Under the authority of this charter, our general assembly exercised executive and judicial as well as legislative functions. . . . Upon the adoption of our Constitution in 1818, which by article II. divided the powers of government, . . . it was . . . logical to hold that all judicial functions of the general assembly were at an end; and this claim was made at an early day, but was not accepted by this court. Starr v. Pease, 8 Conn. 547; Day v. Outler, 22 Conn. 625; Booth v. Woodbury, 32 Conn. 126. . . . If, then, an act of the state legislature is not against natural justice or the national Constitution, and it does not appear affirmatively and expressly that there is some provision in the Constitution forbidding it, we must hold it to be intra vires and valid."

There are no affirmative and express provisions in the Constitution forbidding the exercise by the general assembly of the equity jurisdiction which in former days was exclusively exercised by the "general court;" and so the proposition asserted is broad enough to justify acts of the general assembly adminis-denial, direction, or order within thirty days from the service of notice upon such street-railway company of the rendition, making, or passage of such decision, denial, direction, or order to the superior court, or any judge thereof; such appeal shall be by petition to such court or judge, and shall state specifically the portion or portions of such decision, denial, direction, or order appealed from, and the reasons of such appeal; and such court or judge shall order such notice as may be deemed reasonable to be given to such selectmen, mayor, and common council, and warden and burgesses of the time and place of appearance in answer to such petition, and upon the time fixed for appearance and answer, or as soon thereafter as said court or judge shall order, such appeal shall be tried by said court or judge, and said court or judge shall make such orders in reference to said matters appealed from as may by it or him be deemed equitable in the premises, and the decision of said court or judge shall be final and conclusive upon the parties. And whenever such warden and burgesses, mayor and common council, or selectmen shall, under the provisions of § 2 of chap. clxix. of the Public Acts of 1893, be deemed to have refused to approve and accept any plan presented by any street-railway company, said street-railway company shall have a like right of appeal therefrom to said superior court, or any judge thereof; and said court or judge shall have the same powers with reference to said plan and the acceptance or modification thereof that said principal authorities would have had under the provisions of said act, and may make all such orders with reference thereto as may be deemed equitable."

tering this branch of jurisprudence. Such a doctrine is subversive of the American idea of constitutional government. It affirms that the checks established by the division of governmental power have no existence in this state; that when the Constitution says, "The powers of government shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them confided to a separate magistracy," it means: "The general assembly shall exercise every power of sovereignty which it is not forbidden to exercise by some affirmative and express provision of the Constitution;" that the mandate, "The legislative power of this state shall be vested in two distinct houses, to be styled the 'general assembly,'" does not mean what it says, but means, "The governor and council and house of representatives in general court assembled" shall continue, under the style of the "general assembly," to exercise the supreme power of the state in all matters whatever not forbidden by some affirmative and express provision herein contained; that the mandate, "The judicial power of the state shall be vested in the supreme court of errors, the superior court," etc., means nothing, or means, "such portion of the judicial power as the general assembly shall not exercise by itself or other agencies." This doctrine originates in an expression in an opinion of Daggett, J., in Starr v. Pease, 8 Conn. 547 (Hosmer and Bissell, JJ., concurred in the judgment, and Peters, J., dissented), an expression not necessary to support the judgment rendered, for the validity of a legislative divorce—the matter in dispute—must rest on the claim that it is a law fixing a status on grounds of public policy, and is not a mere adjudication of private rights. Maynard v. Hill 125 U. S. 190, 81 L. ed. 654. Judge Daggett says that it is urged that by the "New Constitution" there is an entire separation of the legislative and judicial departments, and that now the legislature can pass no act not clearly warranted by the Constitution; that precisely the opposite of this is true; that from the settlement of the state there have been certain fundamental rules by which power has been exercised, which were embodied in an instrument called by some a "constitution" and by others a "charter;" that the charter gave extensive power to the legislature, and left everything almost to their will; that, when the new Constitution was framed, it adopted a bill of rights, provided for the election and appointment of certain organs of the government, such as the legislative and other departments, and imposed on them certain restraints; that it found the state sovereign and independent, with a legislative power capable of making all laws necessary for the good of the people, not forbidden by the United States Constitution, nor opposed to sound maxims of legislation, and left them in the same condition, except so far as limitations were provided. This statement was substantially repeated in Pratt v. Allen, 13 Conn. 124, although the judgment in that case was supported on other grounds. In some respects the views of those engaged in framing a constitution, as to its meaning, are entitled to peculiar regard, but not in all respects, and especially not as to the extent of the radical change involved in the adoption of a written constitution. Such a change brought into existence an absolutely new branch of jurisprudence, which judges trained under a different and antagonistic system were not peculiarly fitted to comprehend. In Starr v. Pease, however, the only judge who was a member of the convention of 1818 emphatically dissented. The error of Judge Daggett was fundamental. It was based on the denial of the essential meaning of a written constitution.

Prior to 1818 the whole sovereign power was exercised by the people, unrestrained by anything except their present will, through a body of magistrates chosen annually, and deputies chosen semiannually. This was a democracy, as close to a pure democracy as it is possible for a representative government to be. There were certain forms established by legislation, and certain fundamental principles generally acknowledged as true and important; but there was no power that could enforce them. They depended on the unrestrained will of the people, as expressed semiannually. This body of laws and customs might be broadly called a "constitution." But they were not, and the government was not a constitutional government, in the American sense, which was then taking definite shape, through the influence of the United States Constitution. There was no fundamental law made by the sovereign—the people—embodying their supreme original will, in pursuance of which, and in accordance with which alone, governmental power could be exercised. Such a law is in its very nature a grant of power; a grant by the sovereign to the governmental agencies established; a grant for the very purpose of preventing the sovereign from itself exercising the powers granted (for such exercise by the sovereign must, of necessity, be unrestrained and arbitrary). And so the grant is made to three distinct departments or magistracies, each deriving its delegated power direct from the sovereign, through the Constitution. The only sense in which a constitution may be termed a "limitation," rather than a grant of power, is that the power granted to each department is given broadly, and covers the whole range of that division of power, except as limited by the Constitution. It was this new form of government that the people demanded and established in 1818. It was this new form of government that the advocates of the so called "charter government" for thirty years successfully opposed. They claimed that they had a constitution, because they did not realize what a constitution meant, or were afraid of the restraints it imposed. The idea of a constitution was centered in the separation of judicial and legislative powers, and the grant of each power to a distinct magistracy. On this the fight for change of government was largely made.

When the legislature that called the convention of 1818 met, Governor Wolcott told them that their mandate for the people was "that the legislative, executive, and judicial authorities of our own government be more precisely defined and limited, and the rights of the people be declared and acknowledged." The committee appointed on a revision of the form of civil government, in their report, said that the state was "then destitute of fundamental laws defining and limiting the powers of the legislature;" that the organization of the different branches of the government, and the separation of their power, rested on "the frail foundation of legislative will or discretion." The resolution reported by them, and adopted by the legislature, recommended to the people of the state to assemble and choose delegates who should meet in convention, and, if "by them deemed expedient, proceed in the formation of a constitution of civil government for the people of this state;" and said constitution, when ratified and approved by the people, "shall be and remain the supreme law of this state." There was then a democracy exercising supreme power through deputies chosen semiannually, but no constitution of civil government, in the American sense of that term. In these deputies, when assembled in general court, consisted "the supreme power and authority of this state." When so assembled, they had "the power and voice of all the freemen deputed them;" i. e., the whole power vested in the sovereign,—the people. By virtue of this power so deputed, they recommended to their sovereign to abolish the existing form of government, to establish a new form of civil government, and to appoint delegates to frame a constitution for that purpose, which, when adopted by the sovereign, should be a permanent grant of his power to the agencies therein named, under the limitations therein expressed. This, again, was declared when the convention met, and "resolved that this convention do deem it expedient to proceed at this time to form a constitution of civil government for the people of this state." The Constitution adopted declared that the people of Connecticut, grateful for having been permitted to enjoy a free government (i. e., a democracy), in order more effectively to define and secure the liberties derived from their ancestors (i. e., the English heritage of civil liberty), heretofore resting on "the frail foundation of legislative will or discretion," do "ordain and establish the following Constitution and form of civil government."

The convention adopted the Constitution on September 15; the people approved and ratified it; and on October 12, 1818, it became the Constitution of civil government of the people of Connecticut. On that day and thereafter all powers of government were exercised only by virtue of the authority granted in that instrument. It was "the original supreme will of the people," from which all authority was derived. This clearly appears from § 3 of art. 10, by which the existing rights and duties of corporations are confined and established, subject to the regulations contained in the Constitution. Officers previously commissioned are authorized to exercise their offices until the 1st of June following. Laws not inconsistent with the Constitution are continued in force until altered or repealed in pursuance of the Constitution; and the general court to be formed in October is granted all powers, not repugnant to the Constitution, which they now possess, until the first Wednesday of May following. When it is remembered that the last session of the "general court" had no power whatever, except that granted by the Constitution, the theory that this general court handed over to the general assembly established by the Constitution undefined sovereign power, not derived through that instrument, appears in its naked absurdness. No declaration could be more clear and specific than that on October 12, 1818, the democracy first established in 1637 ceased to exist, and the general court or assembly through which the powers of that democracy had been exercised was then abolished, and every power of government thereafter exercised found its authority only in the Constitution of civil government then adopted by the people as the supreme law of the state. This result was recognized by those who had opposed as well as by those who had advocated the revolution. William L. Stone, editor of the Connecticut Mirror, speaking for the former, said: "Our form of government, under which for near two hundred years all have enjoyed privileges and blessings unknown to any other people upon earth, has been swept away." John N. Niles, editor of the Hartford Times, speaking for the latter, said: "A government of men has been superseded by a government of laws. Distinct and independent bodies of magistracy have been constituted; their powers and duties defined, limited, and separated." Trumbull, Hist. Notes Const. Conv. 1818, p. 59.

The forms of procedure under the Constitution were so similar to those under the former government, and were so largely administered by men who were not only fixed in the old ways of thought, but opposed to the radical change involved in the adoption of a constitution, that it is not strange that some legislation should pass unchallenged, and dicta of judges pass current, clearly contrary to the supreme law. But the form of government established in 1818 cannot be destroyed in that way. This change in the structure of government was a pregnant fact, which anyone long settled in the belief that an exercise of the whole unrestrained power inherent in an absolute democracy, through a body of delegates frequently chosen, furnished the best organic plan for ruling a commonwealth, might well find it difficult to accept in its full significance. The views of Judge Daggett, as expressed in Starr v. Pease, on the effect of a constitution, are those of an able and thoughtful jurist; but we find it more easy to reconcile them with the traditions in which he had been educated, and the conditions existing during the greater part of his long and extensive practice at that bar than with the plain provisions of the Constitution itself. It was the expression of these views that led up to the dictum in Wheeler's Appeal. The other two cases cited do not support the dictum. Day v. Cutler was an action on a promissory note, which involved the validity of a legislative divorce. Ellsworth, J., assumed the validity of the divorce, and held the note given in connection with it to be valid, and Waite, J., concurred. Hinman, J., tried the case below, and gave no opinion. Church, Ch. J., said: "It may be too late now to discuss the question whether, since the powers of this government were separated by the Constitution of 1818, and distributed to the distinct executive, legislative, and judicial departments, respectively, the general assembly can constitutionally exercise the power of granting divorces. This has been doubted by some of our best jurists." But, passing that, he held that, in any event, the note in suit was not valid; and in this opinion Storrs, J., concurred. Booth v. Woodbury does not support, but denies, the dictum. The court expressly says the legislative power is granted to the general assembly by the Constitution. We do not recall a case that necessarily depends on the theory of Judge Daggett, followed in Wheeler's Appeal, unless it be that case. Other utterances of this court are wholly inconsistent with the theory. In the opinion of the judges above cited, the true meaning of a Constitution is conclusively stated. In Brown v. O'Connell, 36 Conn. 482, 446, 4 Am. Rep. 89, the power of the legislature to either exercise or confer judicial power is denied. The case of Re Clark, 65 Conn. 17, 41, 28 L. R. A. 242, plainly assumes that the legislature is confined to the exercise of legislative power. In State v. Conlon, 65 Conn. 478, 488, 31 L. R. A. 55, we say: "The legislative power of this state is, in the broadest terms, vested in the general assembly. This power is, in a certain way, defined and limited by the provisions dividing the powers of government into distinct departments, and by those relating to the operation of the state government and duties of particular officers. But, unlike the Constitutions of many states, it contains no specific limitations on the exercise of legislative power, except some slight restrictions in one or two recent amendments. The limitations, however, are no less real, and perhaps more effective, than if phrased in specific terms." In State, Bulkeley, v. Williams, 68 Conn. 181, 149, the opinion of the court assumes that only legislative power is granted to the general assembly; and the dissenting opinion of Andrews, Ch. J. (in this matter not antagonizing the majority), states that, upon the ratification of the Constitution, "the former government by general assembly was finally and forever dissolved. The people, in the exercise of their sovereignty, established a new government in their separate and independent departments, whose powers were to be exercised and exercised only, in accordance with their supreme original will, embodied in the Constitution." Page 169, 68 Conn.

But no dicta of judges, no doubtful or improper legislation, can alter the plain fact that in 1818 the people, in the exercise of their sovereignty, granted to the general assembly then constituted the legislative power, and forbade their exercise of other than legislative power (unless specially granted), and granted to this court and other courts then constituted the judicial department,—the judicial power,—and forbade their exercise of other than judicial power. The assertion of original and consistent opponents of a constitution that the victory of 1818 was a barren victory, that constitutional government, as known to the people of the United States, is unknown to Connecticut, and that the fundamental principles of constitutional law have here no existence, however often repeated, cannot affect the paramount authority of the supreme original will of the people, as plainly declared in the Constitution 89 L. R. A.

itself. The unequivocal mandate therein contained, that the powers delegated or granted by the sovereign,—the people,—through the Constitution, shall be divided into three distinct departments, and those belonging to each confided to a separate magistracy, and the equally unequivocal mandate that the powers granted to the general assembly (unless by some specific provision) shall be confined to the exercise of the "legislative power of this state," and the powers granted to the judiciary shall be confined to the exercise of "the judicial power of the state," are binding upon this court at all times. These mandates are the voice of the sovereign, speaking ever with a present authority, from which there is no escape. The incapacity of the legislature to execute a power which is essentially and merely a judicial power, and of the judiciary to execute a power which is essentially and merely a legislative power, as well as the limitation of the meaning of legislative power by force of certain primary principles of government plainly embodied in the Constitution, and by the necessities involved in the separation and independence of distinct departments of government, is fundamental to the very existence of constitutional government, as established in the United States. Wilkinson v. Leland, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 627, 7 L. ed. 542; Houston v. Williams, 18 Cal. 24, 78 Am. Dec. 565; Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 140, 40 Am. Dec. 274; Cochran v. Van Sur- lay, 20 Wend. 865, 32 Am. Dec. 570; Campbell's Case, 2 Bland (Ch.) 209, 20 Am. Dec. 860. This court has not hesitated to affirm and apply the principle here involved. Brown v. O'Connell, 36 Conn. 482, 446, 4 Am. Rep. 89; Opinion of the Judges, 30 Conn. 593; Clark, 65 Conn. 17, 41, 28 L. R. A. 242, and State v. Conlon, 65 Conn. 478, 488, 31 L. R. A. 55. We believe Wheeler's Appeal to be the only case that necessarily may involve a different view, but for the reasons given it is powerless to change the principle. The Supreme Court of the United States has uniformly held that a law conferring on the courts a power which is not a judicial power, within the meaning of the Constitution, is unconstitutional, and that such power cannot be lawfully exercised by the courts. Note by court on United States v. Todd, 54 U. S. 13 How. 58, 14 L. ed. 47; Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 893, 25 L. ed. 725.

The power which Judge Hall was asked to exercise in the present case does not seem to us to be a judicial power, within the meaning of our Constitution. It is claimed that the difficulty of defining the powers of government renders impracticable the enforcement by this court of their division, and so makes nugatory the most important command of the Constitution. A difficulty attends the application of a general principle to particular cases, and sometimes, the more vital the principle, the greater the difficulty. This was felt when the United States Supreme Court first dealt with a conflict between a law of Congress and the Constitution. It was felt still more when the court began to apply the general principle that a state law dealing with internal police may, to a certain extent, validly occupy a field of legislation, within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. It is a peculiarity of the essence of constitutional government that the judicial department must deal with such difficulties; otherwise, constitutional provisions for the guaranty of civil liberty, the harmonious separation of state and national functions, as well as the separation of governmental departments, become a solemn mockery. But the difficulty now alleged is more apparent than substantial. Chief Justice Marshall says: "The legislature makes, the executive executes, and the judiciary construes, the law." Wayman v. Southard, 28 U. S. 10 Wheat. 46, 6 L. ed. 263. The Supreme Court of the United States, speaking by Justice Field, says: "The distinction between a judicial and legislative act is well defined. The one determines what the law is, and what the rights of parties are, with reference to transactions already had; the other prescribes what the law shall be in future cases arising under it." Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700, 25 L. ed. 496.

One controlling consideration in deciding whether a particular act oversteps the limits of judicial power is the necessary inconsistency of such acts with the independence of the judicial department, and the preservation of its sphere of action distinct from that of the legislative and executive departments. A main purpose of the division of powers between legislature and judicature is to prevent the same magistracy from exercising in respect to the same subject the functions of judge and legislator. This union of functions is a menace to civil liberty, and is forbidden by the Constitution. There is no intrinsic difficulty in recognizing a plain infraction of such prohibition. It is true that the different magistracies must act upon the same subjects, for every matter that may be dealt with by the state government may be acted on by each department thereof; but the action must be that belonging to the department whose powers are invoked. The main difficulties suggested in argument result from a failure to distinguish between the exercise of a legitimate power and the employment of necessary means for exercising that power. The grant of the powers embraced in one of the great departments of government carries with it the right to use means appropriate to the exercise of that power. Any attempt to cripple the power through metaphysical classification of the means essential to its exercise must produce difficulties, if not absurdities. For example, the power to make laws may require the accurate ascertainment of facts. For this purpose, witnesses must be summoned, examined, and conclusions drawn from their conflicting testimony. This is a means peculiarly appropriate to the judicial power and the ordinary mark of an exercise of that power; yet, when so employed by the legislature (without violation of other constitutional provisions), it is a means within the limits of legislative power. But should the legislature, after the passage of an act, attempt, by another act, to adjudicate the rights of parties which have arisen under its provisions, such act, although only means appropriate to legislation might be employed, would be an exercise of judicial, and not of legislative, power. It would be void, because it involves the union, in the same magistracy, in respect to the same matter, of the functions of judge and legislator. Again, there are certain necessary executive acts which cannot be performed without the power of enforcing immediate obedience to an order authorized by law. The employment of legal restraint for the purpose of securing the essential immediate obedience is a means peculiarly appropriate to the exercise of judicial power; but for such purpose, and subject to the restrictions of other provisions of the Constitution, it is a means within the limits of the executive power. Re Clark, 85 Conn. 17, 28 L. R. A. 242; Murray v. Hoboken Land & Improv. Co. 59 U. S. 18 How. 272, 15 L. ed. 872.

So, means of a legislative nature must be used by courts in establishing necessary rules of practice, and by executive officers in making regulations for the conduct of subordinates. Again, appointment to office is in the nature of an executive act. Apart from the purpose of the appointment, it is an exercise of executive power. Our own Constitution, like most constitutions, provides for certain elective and legislative appointments; but, except in the cases specified, appointment to office is an exercise of executive power, unless used as a means appropriate to the exercise of powers granted to another department, and, when so used, it is not the exercise of executive power, within the meaning of the Constitution. The Constitution of the United States specifies the methods of appointment. Certain officers must be appointed by the president in concurrence with the Senate. All other officers shall be appointed in the same way. "But the Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they shall think proper in the president alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments." In commenting on this clause, the United States Supreme Court says that the appointing power designated in respect to inferior officers "was, no doubt, intended to be exercised by the department of the government to which the officer to be appointed most appropriately belonged." Ex parte Hennen, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 257, 10 L. ed. 151. In affirming the validity of the law providing for the appointment of supervisors of elections by circuit courts, the supreme court held that there were reasons why such appointments might most appropriately be made by courts, relied on this clause as giving a certain discretion to Congress in assigning such appointments to the appropriate department, and, referring to the intimation in Ex parte Hennen, said: "In the present case there is no such incongruity in the duty required as to excuse the courts from its performance, or to render their acts void." Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 398, 25 L. ed. 717, 727.

Under our state Constitution, appointments other than those whose mode is prescribed are governed by the division of governmental powers. This question has never come before us directly. It was incidentally considered in some recent cases in connection with the law allowing an appeal from the action of county commissioners in granting licenses. In Smith's Appeal, 65 Conn. 185, we held that the statute required the county commissioners to select, as the recipient of a license, one having "a personal fitness to perform the quasi-public duties required by law of a licensee;" & c., one who is shown to be suited or adapted to the orderly conduct of a business which the law regards as dangerous to public welfare, unless conducted by a carefully selected person duly licensed, whose fitness to the legal requirements must be determined in view of the statutory regulations. In Hopson's Appeal, 65 Conn. 140, we held that the selection or appointment of such a license was a means apparently appropriate both to the exercise of executive and judicial power; that the uniform practice of courts and legislature in so treating such appointment might be safely accepted when the distinction to be drawn must be subtle and doubtful; and that the action of the superior court upon an appeal from the county commissioners is a judicial proceeding in so far that the judgment of the court may be reviewed by this court when founded on a misconception of the law as was held in Smith's Appeal, 65 Conn. 185, and in Beard's Appeal, 64 Conn. 526, but that errors claimed in the lawful exercise of discretion in making the selection or appointment could not be reviewed. Such proceeding by appeal is an anomalous one. It confounds process for invoking the exercise of judicial power by way of ordinary judicial proceedings in protecting an individual against the illegal acts of a public officer with the use of the power of appointment as a means incident to the full exercise of judicial power. It is evident that the justification of such judicial appointments must be found in the circumstances peculiar to each case.

While the necessity and right of each department to use the means requisite to its unfettered operation is clear, it is equally clear that when one department not only uses the means appropriate to another, but uses them for the purpose of executing the functions of that other department, it is not in the exercise of its granted power. The legislature, by judicial means, may find the facts showing that a charter subject to repeal ought to be repealed, and act in the exercise of its legislative functions. Crease v. Babcock, 23 Pick. 344, 34 Am. Dec. 61. But when, by the same means, it attempts to adjudge the forfeiture of a charter not repealable, it acts in the exercise of a judicial function, and in excess of its power. This distinction is illustrated in the decisions of the United States Supreme Court dealing with legislative regulations of charges by railroad companies. The regulation of such charges is held to be distinctly a legislative function, which may be delegated by the legislature to a subordinate legislative or administrative body; but if this subordinate body, or the legislature, exceeds its powers, and a person is thereby injured in his rights of property, he may invoke the judicial power to determine that question of legal injury; and the reasonableness of the charges, although a question legislative in its nature, must be reviewed by the court, as necessarily incident to the exercise of its judicial power. But, if the court should attempt to establish for the future a schedule of charges, it would exceed the limits of judicial power; it would act as legislator in respect to a matter as to which it must also act as judge. As was said by Mr. Justice Brewer in one of the latest of this class of cases: "The courts are not authorized to revise or change the body of rates imposed by a legislature or a commission; they do not determine whether one rate is preferable to another, or what, under all circumstances, would be fair and reasonable, as between the carriers and the shippers; they do not engage in any mere administrative work; but still there can be no doubt of their power and duty to inquire whether a body of rates prescribed by a legislature or a commission is unjust and unreasonable, and such as to work a practical destruction to rights of property, and, if found so to be, to restrain its operation." Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 363, 38 L. ed. 1014, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560. The same distinction is noted by this court in referring to the anomalous process for protection against illegal taxation, provided by § 3860 et seq. of the General Statutes. In construing that statute, we held that "the assessment of property for taxation is an administrative proceeding; the judicial power is called into action to remedy an illegal assessment;" but that the law did not impose upon the superior court the duties of assessors, nor purport to give the court general authority to review the action of the assessors or board of relief. Ives v. Goshen, 65 Conn. 456, 459. It is true, however, that in cases arising under statutes enabling the court to settle rights of person or property invaded by illegal acts of administrative boards, and which may be questioned rather for the defective process provided than for any substantial misconception of the limits of judicial power, this distinction has not been marked, as it must be when the validity of a statute is directly put in issue. We think this distinction is decisive of the present case.

The meaning of the act of 1893, relating to street railways, is uncertain in several particulars; but there can be no doubt that it confers on municipal authorities, in addition to certain executive powers, the power of establishing regulations and conditions (within the limitations prescribed) which shall control all the street railways in the state, in the location, construction, and operation of railways. There can be no doubt that making such regulations is essentially and distinctively a legislative function. It is also certain that the judicial power does not include the exercise of such a legislative function, and that the duty of making such regulations cannot be imposed upon the superior court, because it involves the exercise of legislative power by the court, and because a power in the legislature to impose such duties is inconsistent with the existence of an independent and separate judicial department of government. The power to make the superior court a subordinate legislative body for one purpose involves the power to so utilize it for every purpose. But it is equally certain that the judicial power does extend to the protection of every right of person or property that may be invaded by a municipal council in the unlawful exercise of the powers conferred by the act of 1893. This judicial power may be called into action by any appropriate process. The act of 1895 provided, among other things, that an aggrieved person might appeal from an order made by a municipal council in pursuance of the act of 1893; that such appeal should be a petition to the court, which should specifically state the portion of the order appealed from, and the reasons, and be served on the council, and that such appeal should be tried by the court, and appropriate judgment rendered. Construing this act as we have construed other acts authorizing appeals from the action of legislative and administrative boards, as providing a nondescript kind of process intended to serve the combined purposes of a writ of injunction, certiorari, and mandamus, or of any other process for invoking the judicial power to determine a legal injury complained of, we substantially held in Central R. & Electric Co.'s Appeal, 87 Conn. 197, 214, that a party aggrieved by such illegal order might find lawful redress in this way. Our attention was not directed to the possible limitations of the redress. We went to the furthest limit in our desire to give effect to a legitimate intention of the legislature, most inadequately expressed. But the act of 1895 goes further, and contains an additional provision, which is not fairly susceptible of being construed as merely providing for a process to bring into action the judicial power of the court, and which, without any action by a municipal council other than a failure to act within a limited time, purports to transfer to the court all the powers conferred upon municipal councils by the act of 1893. The distinction between the two provisions of the act is vital. The application to the court in such case is called an "appeal,"—an unfortunate name, because it does not express the real function of the process. "Appeal," in the sense of transfer of jurisdiction from one court to another, cannot be predicated of any process by which a court is called upon to determine the legality of an act done by officers of another department. In this sense there can be no appeal from a common council to a court, any more than there can be an appeal from the legislature to the court, or from the court to the legislature. In appeals from the court of probate to the superior court we sometimes speak of the superior court as being for that case the court of probate, and speak correctly, for probate jurisdiction is within the judicial power, and may be exercised by the superior court; but when we speak in the same way, as occasionally we have spoken, in commenting on the discretionary power that may be exercised in one of these amorphous "appeals" from administrative boards, the expression is allowable only as a figure of rhetoric. The so-called "appeal" in this case is not a process to invoke the judicial power. It is simply an application to the superior court to exercise a legislative function. The conditions on which the act of 1893 authorizes such an application cannot affect its real nature. They only serve to limit for the time being the extent of the evil involved.

We have assumed, as was assumed in argument, that the act of 1895 purports to confer the powers in question upon a judge, in his exercise of the judicial power vested in the superior court, and does not purport to appoint, for the exercise of the powers, an executive officer, designated by an official title, instead of by name. If the latter were true, the judge would be at liberty to accept or decline the appointment, and this court would have no jurisdiction to review his action. Legislation authorizing process (mostly under the misleading name of "appeal") for invoking the judicial power, to be returned to a judge of the superior court or to the "superior court or any judge thereof," has produced some confusion in respect to the nature of the power thus exercised. This court has decided that a "writ of error" (which formerly, in connection with the auxiliary means of reservation, was the only process for calling into action its jurisdiction) does not lie without a judgment or an award in the nature of a judgment (Williams v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 18 Conn. 110, 118); and also that this court has cognizance only of writs of error from the superior court (Green v. Hobby, 8 Conn. 165; Humphrey v. Marshall, 15 Conn. 841, 345; Trinity College v. Hartford, 82 Conn. 466, note). But these decisions did not hold that judicial power could be exercised by a judge of the superior court only when holding a stated session of court. The legislation which followed the decision in Trinity College v. Hartford, providing for a proceeding in error to this court from the final judgment rendered by a judge of the superior court in the exercise of his jurisdiction, could have no application unless such judgments are rendered in the exercise of the judicial power vested in the superior court. In Clapp v. Hartford, 35 Conn. 66, 78, 220, 222, decided shortly after the enactment of this legislation, language is used indicating that a judge in such case does not exercise that power, and this language is followed in the dissenting opinion in Central R. & Electric Co.'s Appeal, 87 Conn. 228. But such views cannot be maintained. "The superior court," in which judicial power is vested by the Constitution, is a magistracy consisting of the judges. The manner in which they shall exercise that power must to a large extent be governed by legislation in respect to procedure. Ordinarily, that power can only be exercised at a formal session of court, which may be held for some purposes by one judge, and for other purposes by two or more judges. But some things within the limits of judicial power may more properly be done by a judge in chambers; and jurisdiction which should ordinarily be intrusted only to a judge while holding a formal session of court may, in cases of emergency, be exercised in vacation. That most important portion of judicial power invoked by the writ of habeas corpus would be seriously crippled if it could only be exercised at a formal session of court; so with the granting of injunctions and other incidents of chancery jurisdiction. A large portion of the judicial power from its very nature can be lawfully exercised only at a formal session of court; and it may be true that the exercise of other judicial power by a judge in chambers, justifiable in cases of emergency, has been carried too far, and that it would be better if all "appeals" or other process intended to invoke the judicial power should be made returnable to a court in session, unless in plain cases of emergency; but when process for bringing such matters before a judge in chambers is provided by law, the jurisdiction which he exercises must be within the judicial power vested by the Constitution in "the superior court." This view is indicated in our decision in Central R. & Electric Co.'s Appeal, 87 Conn. 228. We think the act of 1895 intended to impose the duties therein prescribed upon a judge of the superior court, in his exercise of "the judicial power" granted to the judicial department. As the present application calls for an exercise of power which is not a judicial power, within the meaning of the Constitution, it should have been dismissed.

In no way has the confidence of the people in their superior court been more clearly shown than in the increasing number of instances in which special process has been provided for obtaining, in a summary manner, its aid in protecting rights liable to be infringed by the action of executive officers and administrative boards. This court fully appreciates the desirability and necessity of enlarging and simplifying procedure so as to call into action, in the most speedy and effectual manner, the judicial power for the purpose of dealing with all questions arising under changing conditions, which it may properly determine, and has endeavored to construe legislation for that purpose, sometimes perhaps with apparent inconsistency, so as to give the fullest possible effect to the legislative intent. The law under consideration, however, goes too far. It involves a recognition by the court of a right to exercise powers plainly beyond the scope of that judicial power confided to it by the Constitution, and to exercise these powers, not as an incident to some legitimate judicial function, but, in the first instance, independent of any purpose except the mere execution of the powers. We cannot recognize such a right, because the recognition leads inevitably to the obliteration of any line of separation between the judicial and other departments of government.

There is error in the judgment complained of, and it is reversed.

The other Judges concur, except Baldwin, J., who dissents.

Baldwin, J. dissenting:

I concur in the view that divorces may be granted by the general assembly in cases where no court has jurisdiction to act, and that the judgments in Starr v. Pease, 8 Conn. 547, and Day v. Culler, 22 Conn. 625, can therefore be supported. I also concur in overruling the decision in Wheeler's Appeal, 45 Conn. 806, but do so upon the ground that the legislation which was there in question assumed to grant to a particular person a special and exclusive privilege from the community, of applying for extraordinary judicial relief, as to a particular cause of action in derogation of the general laws. I dissent in other respects from the judgment and opinion of the court.

The whole legislative power of the state is vested in the general assembly. Except for the few restrictions which the Constitution imposes upon it, that body is as free and untrammelled as the people would themselves have been had they retained the lawmaking power in their own hands, or as they are in adopting such constitutional amendments from time to time, as they think fit. State, Buikley, v. Williams, 68 Conn. 181, 149.

One of these restrictions is the subject of article 2, entitled "Of the Distribution of Powers." As originally reported to the constitutional convention by the committee charged with the duty of preparing the draft of a Constitution, this article read thus:

Article Second. Distribution of Powers.

Sec. 1. The powers of government shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them confided to a separate body of magistracy, to wit, those which are legislative to one, those which are executive to another, and those which are judicial to another.

Sec. 2. No person or collection of persons, being of one of those departments, shall exercise any power belonging to either of the others, except in the instances hereinafter expressly directed or permitted.

This article, except for some merely formal alterations in the 1st section, was a copy of one adopted by Mississippi in the preceding year. 2 Poore's Const. 1056. Objection was made in our convention to the 2d section, and ten days later that was stricken out, without a division. Jour. Conn. Const. Conv. pp. 78, 55. This seems to me clearly to evince an intention not to attempt to limit the functions that might be imposed upon those holding a place in any particular one of the three magistracies to such as should be strictly incident to their special department. It was sufficiently implied from the 1st section, in connection with the three following articles, relating to the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, that no legislative power should be exercised except by the general assembly, and no judicial power except by judicial officers. The supreme executive power (not, as in the Constitution of the United States, the executive power) was also exclusively vested in the governor. But the framers of our Constitution, differing from many of those who had fulfilled similar tasks for other states, recognized the fact that it is practically impossible to establish in every instance a plain line of demarcation between legislative, executive, and judicial functions, and deemed it unnecessary to deprive the state of such services as it might desire from any of its citizens, because he held office in a department to which they might not properly pertain. See 1 Story, Const. § 524; Pom. Const. § 178. Certain judicial and executive officers were, by art. 10, § 4, expressly debarred from the general assembly, but I find no other provision to prevent the discharge by any magistrate of public duties in addition to those peculiarly belonging to his special department, whether he assume them voluntarily or they be imposed as a statutory duty. There are powers of government which in one sense are, as the case may be, legislative or judicial, and in another sense are not. The powers ordinarily granted to municipal corporations to regulate their local affairs, and pass by-laws or ordinances, are of a legislative character. Such ordinances have, within their proper sphere, the force of law; but no one would contend that they are void because not passed by the general assembly. The rules of practice and pleading prescribed by the judges of the superior court from time to time are also law as to the cases to which they apply; but the legislative action from which they proceed is really made, by the statute which authorizes them, an incident of judicial power. The jurisdiction long exercised by our courts with respect to the lay-out of new highways is of an administrative, quite as much, to say the least, as of a judicial, nature. The general assembly might itself give such relief, and sometimes does. State, Buikley, v. Williams, 68 Conn. 181. It might confide these functions to an administrative board, like the railroad commissioners. It can give an appeal from such a board to the courts. Westbrook's Appeal, 57 Conn. 95, 104; Fairfield's Appeal, 57 Conn. 167, 172. It can give a similar appeal to a taxpayer who claims that his property has been assessed upon an undue valuation, or who objects to the licensing of a particular liquor seller. Such an appeal may serve to turn the matter of controversy into a cause of a judicial nature. Beard's Appeal, 64 Conn. 526, 534. Yet its origin may still so far determine the form of proceeding as to leave the court free to exercise a discretionary power, unfettered by the ordinary rules that govern judicial trials. Its function is, in truth, one both judicial and executive in its nature, and so one which the general assembly might properly commit to either the judicial or executive department, or to both. Hopson's Appeal, 65 Conn. 140, 146.

Our statutes were revised in 1821, three years after the adoption of the Constitution, by a very able commission, headed by Chief Justice Swift. They fully appreciated the great revolution that had been accomplished by the constitutional distribution of the powers of government. Rev. 1821, p. 150. Part of their task was to weed out all existing legislation that was inconsistent with it. Nevertheless, this revision retained the old provisions authorizing the county courts to lay county taxes, and added one charging them with the duty of taking care of, letting, selling, or buying county property, at their discretion (pp. 141, 250); gave any two justices of the peace in any town power to make rules for confining or killing dogs when necessary for public safety (p. 179); authorized any justice of the peace to commit a witness who refused to answer any proper question put to him by grand jurors, meeting as a court of inquiry (p. 260); and forbade tanning except by persons who had proved their skill to the county court, and received a license from it for the purpose (p. 308). Our statutes since the Revision of 1821 have contained continually increasing grants of jurisdiction to our courts and judges over matters of administrative procedure. They rest, it seems to me, on solid ground of public convenience and practical necessity; and if it be claimed, as in this case, that the constitutional provision as to the distribution of powers has been transgressed, "the sufficient answer is [to quote from a recent opinion of this court, in which all the judges concurred] that these great functions of government are not divided in any such way that all acts of the nature of the functions of one department can never be exercised by another department; such a division is impracticable, and, if carried out would result in the paralysis of government. Executive, legislative, and judicial powers of necessity overlap each other, and cover many acts which are in their nature common to more than one department. These great functions of government are committed to the different magistracies in all their fullness, and involve many incidental powers necessary to their execution, even though such incidental powers, in their intrinsic character, belong more naturally to a different department." Re Clark, 65 Conn. 17, 38, 28 L. R. A. 242. Courts may properly be called upon to aid administrative tribunals in the exercise of their powers, whenever there is need of judicial relief. The dignity and independence of the judiciary is in no way impaired by making it ancillary, in such cases, to the work of another department. Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, 154 U. S. 447, 487, 38 L. ed. 1047, 1060, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 545.

The applicant in this case holds a franchise from the state for the construction of a railway in certain streets in the city of Norwalk. The general laws provide that in such a case the city authorities, or the superior court, or a judge thereof, on appeal, shall first approve the plan of construction, and that a neglect by the city either to approve or disapprove, within a time specified, shall be deemed equivalent to a disapproval. It was undoubtedly competent for the general assembly to grant this franchise, and to guard against its improper exercise by giving the city supervisory powers. It was equally within its appropriate domain to grant an appeal to some suitable tribunal from any unreasonable conditions which the city might impose. I do not think that it can be said, as matter of law, that the superior court, or a judge thereof, is an unsuitable tribunal, or one upon which the Constitution forbids such duty to be imposed. The function so conferred upon it may, perhaps, be regarded as one both judicial and executive in its nature. If so, the long-continued practice of the state has settled, if it was ever doubtful, to quote from another of our recent opinions, "the true meaning of the constitutional requirement that judicial and executive powers shall each be confided to a separate magistracy, so far as it affects this question. Such a practical construction may safely be accepted when the theoretical distinction to be drawn by the court must be subtle and doubtful." Hopson's Appeal, 65 Conn. 140, 146. I think, however, that the appeal to Judge Hall may fairly be regarded as a judicial proceeding, calling for the exercise of judicial power. He was bound to dispose of it in accordance with the fundamental rules of law. Hopson's Appeal, 65 Conn. 140, 148. His decision, subject to that limitation, was "final and conclusive upon the parties." Pub. Acts 1895, p. 631. Here is a cause, brought before a judicial magistrate, to redress a wrong, and so obtain the benefit of a public grant; known rules of procedure; a party plaintiff and a party defendant; provision for a final judgment determining the right in controversy, and for an appeal to this court for error in law. Central Railway & Electric Co.'s Appeal, 67 Conn. 197, 206. Such a proceeding, it seems to me, may fairly be termed "judicial." But, if it be deemed to involve only an exercise of quasi-judicial or administrative power, for reasons already stated I think such a power can be lawfully conferred on a judge of the superior court. Controversies as to the manner in which the use of a franchise, granted for the public benefit, shall be guarded in the public interest, may ordinarily be settled either by legislative, judicial, or administrative proceedings, at the will of the legislature, as it may be expressed in the grant, or in the general laws passed to regulate its exercise.

The fact that the city of Norwalk took no action upon the plan submitted by the railway company does not seem to me to vary the appellate character of this proceeding. Inaction, under such circumstances, was as prejudicial to the company as adverse action. It is always competent for a legislature to treat a failure to dissent within a reasonable time as equivalent to assent, or an omission to accept as equivalent to a refusal. Giffillan v. Union Canal Co. 190 U. S. 401, 27 L. ed. 977. I do not, however, regard the duty of the judge of the superior court to take cognizance of this petition as at all dependent on its being in the nature of an appeal. In my opinion it would have been the same had the statute authorized the submission of the plan of construction to him as an original proceeding. United States v. Ritchie, 58 U. S. 17 How. 525, 15 L. ed. 236. The Constitution required the establishment of a superior court, but its "powers and jurisdiction," as well as those of all inferior courts, were left to "be defined by law." Article 5, § 1. The statute which governs this case is such a law. It defines the powers and jurisdiction of the superior court and of its judges as to a particular class of controversies. A difference of opinion between a municipal corporation and private corporation as to what is a reasonable use of a legislative franchise affecting the public highways, which difference must be settled before the franchise can be used at all, seems to me to present a case which it is eminently proper to place within the jurisdiction of a court. An analogous proceeding at common law was that by writ of certiorari, in the exercise by the court of King's bench of a general superintending power over, not only inferior courts, but any persons invested by the legislature with power to decide on the property or rights of the citizen. Le Roy v. New York, 20 Johns. 480, 438, 11 Am. Dec. 289; Mendon v. Worcester County Comrs. 2 Allen, 463, 465. Had the general assembly authorized a railway company, whose plan of construction, though duly submitted to the city authorities, had neither been approved nor disapproved, to apply to the superior court for a mandamus to compel them to act, there could have been no objection to such a remedy. 39 L. R. A.

But, if such a matter can be brought before the judiciary in that way, is it not a mere question of legislative policy whether an opportunity shall be granted to seek full relief in the same forum by substituting, for an authority that has failed to do its duty, an authority not less fitted to decide impartially, and better fitted to weigh evidence and construe the law? To me it seems also a mere question of legislative policy whether or not to confer upon the courts in the first instance the right to pass upon the plan of construction proposed as the mode of exercising a railway franchise. A law to that effect would define their jurisdiction none the less because it extended it. It would remit for judicial decision an administrative question, but one involving rights of property, and so affecting large public interests as to call for a prompt and final decision. It would, in my view, become a judicial question as soon as the law brought it before judicial authority in a judicial proceeding. People v. Long Island R. Co. 184 N.Y. 506.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following opinion was handed down on November 5, 1897:

Per Curiam:

The motion is denied. The appeal to Judge Hall was taken under the provision of the act of 1895 authorizing an appeal whenever the municipal authorities shall fail to notify the railroad company of their decision as prescribed, and transferring, in such event, to the court "the same powers with reference to said plan and the acceptance or modification thereof that said municipal authorities would have had under the provisions of said act" of 1893. This appeal should have been dismissed, because the court had no jurisdiction to entertain such an application; and for this reason we reversed the judgment. Counsel now claim that the appeal to Judge Hall was also an appeal under the preceding provision of the act of 1895, authorizing an appeal from any "decision, denial, order, or direction," and requiring such appeal to be by petition stating specifically the portion of such decision, etc., appealed from, and the reasons of such appeal, and urge their failure to argue this claim upon the original argument as a ground for granting the present motion. The considerations now suggested in support of their claim, as well as those in further support of the appellant's main contention, were carefully weighed before our decision was announced. We held that the appeal to Judge Hall was not taken from any decision, etc., under the first provision of the act of 1895, but was taken solely under the latter provision, which we held to be invalid. The judgment of reversal simply directs the dismissal of the application to Judge Hall, for want of jurisdiction. It is not a bar to the new presentation of a plan to the city council, and a proper appeal, if occasion shall arise, under the first provision of the act of 1895.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Alexander BROWN, Appt.,

v.

Sarah G. MCGILL et al.

(.....Md.....)

A trust to place one's property beyond the reach of creditors, while retaining full enjoyment of the income and revenues therefrom through the instrumentality of a trustee, cannot be created, even by a married woman or a woman in contemplation of marriage.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City in favor of defendants in a suit brought to enforce payment of defendants' debt out of property which she had placed in the hands of a trustee for her benefit. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Carroll T. Bond and William L. Marbury, for appellant:

Before a married woman's separate estate can be bound, it must be shown that her contract was made with direct reference to such separate estate.

Koontz v. Nabb, 16 Md. 549.

The intention to charge the separate estate need not necessarily appear upon the face of the written contract, but may be gathered from evidence aliunde.

Jackson v. West, 22 Md. 71.

When a married woman acquires property in any of the modes prescribed by the statute, without any declaration or limitation to her separate use, and without any special mode or power of disposition annexed to the estate, the statutory use attaches, and the statutory mode of disposition exclusively applies and controls. But where property is conveyed or settled upon a feme covert to her separate use, and a specific mode of alienation or appointment is provided in the instrument creating the estate, that mode must be pursued, as it operates as a negation of any other, and is a paramount law governing and controlling the contract in relation to the property. In such case, however, if there be no specific mode of disposition prescribed, or no restriction thereon, the feme covert may act in reference to the disposition of the estate as a feme sole.

Armstrong v. Kerns, 61 Md. 367.

The idea that this man (or this woman) who to day is worth a quarter of a million with property all liable for the payment of his debts, can by any act of his own transform himself into a pauper so far as creditors are concerned, while continuing to enjoy his wealth, is one which he cannot be reasonably expected to conceive of.

This court went as far as they could in Smith v. Tower, 69 Md. 77, to effect the intention of the testator, which was so expressly declared; but proper adherence to the policy of the law in the state will not allow the extension of the doctrine of Tower's Case beyond the limitations of that decision, nor to a case not falling clearly within its reasons and reasoning; and this case does not.

Baker v. Keiser, 75 Md. 332.

The exemption attempted to be conferred upon the use of the property, by the declaration that the same shall be free from liability for any of the debts of the author and beneficiary of the trust, is simply void and without effect, as being contrary to law.

Warner v. Rice, 66 Md. 436; Mackason's Appeal, 42 Pa. 330, 82 Am. Dec. 517; Andrew v. Lewis, 17 W. N. C. 270; Lewis v. Miller, 21 W. N. C. 94; Ghormley v. Smith, 139 Pa. 584, 11 L. R. A. 565; Mellivaine v. Smith, 42 Mo. 58, 97 Am. Dec. 295; Bryan v. Knickerbacker, 1 Barb. Ch. 409; Gray, Restraints on Alienation, §§ 180, 268; Pacific Nat. Bank v. Windram, 138 Mass. 175; Jackson v. Von Zedlitz, 136 Mass. 342; Lackland v. Smith, 5 Mo. App. 153.

It is true that in England, ever since Lord Thurlow's time, the law which, contrary to the law of this state, as announced in Smith v. Towers, forbids such restraints on alienation when attempted in favor of all other persons, does favor and sustain the same in favor of a married woman so long as her coverture continues.

Jackson v. Hobhouse, 2 Meriv. 483; Tullett v. Armstrong, 4 Myl. & C. 377; Hulme v. Tenant, 1 White & Tudor, Lead. Cas. in Eq. 5th ed. 521, 4th Am. ed. 481, and notes; Pemberton v. McGill, 1 Drew. & S. 266; Arnold v. Woodhams, L. R. 16 Eq. 29; Stanley v. Stanley, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 589; Stogdon v. Lee [1891] 1 Q. B. 661; Baggett v. Meux, 1 Colly. Ch. Cas. 133.

But it will be found upon examination of these authorities that this doctrine was adopted with great reluctance by the courts of England; that it grew out of the necessities of the case as the law relating to married women then stood, and that there is no conceivable reason why it should be adopted as a rule of law in this state in cases where the married woman is at once the author and beneficiary of the trust, in view of the fact that the conditions which gave rise to it and made it necessary and proper in England are entirely absent here, having been removed by recent legislation.

The reason against adoption of the English doctrine on this point by the courts of this country, where common-law restrictions upon the property rights of married women have been so largely swept away by statute, as in our state, and in most of the other states in the Union, are very cogently stated in:

Pacific Nat. Bank v. Windram, 133 Mass. 175; Jackson v. Von Zedlitz, 136 Mass. 342; Ghormley v. Smith, 139 Pa. 584, 11 L. R. A. 565; Stewart v. Madden, 153 Pa. 445; Hall v. Eccleston, 37 Md. 520; Cooke v. Husbards, 11 Md. 506; Pybus v. Smith, 3 Bro. Ch. 347.

band in constant endeavors to wrest her property from her, the only possible reason why a court of equity should deem it desirable that married women should not have the power of disposition as contended for in this case.

Messrs. Bernard Carter, Stewart Brown, Arthur George Brown, and F. W. Brune for appellees.

Boyd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Baltimore city, dismissing the bill of complaint filed by the appellant against Sarah G. McGill, Carroll S. McGill, her husband, and James McEvoy, trustee. The bill alleges that on the 16th day of September, 1895, Sarah G. McGill gave the appellant her note for the sum of $3,000, which she borrowed from him with the understanding and agreement that it should be payable, when demanded, out of her separate estate, whether held in her own name or by the intervention of her trustee, James McEvoy, and that it was her intention and purpose to bind and charge her separate estate with the payment thereof. On the 10th day of September, 1894, which was a day or two before Mrs. McGill, who was the widow of George B. Graham, deceased, was married to Carroll S. McGill, she executed a deed of trust by which she assigned and conveyed to James McEvoy, trustee, all property which she had derived from the estate of George B. Graham, and which she might receive from her daughter, Isabella Brown Graham, in trust, "to collect, receive, and, after making all proper deductions for taxes and other charges thereon, to pay over, the net rents, profits, dividends, interest, and income of all said property, real, personal, and mixed, to her, the said Sarah G. Graham, during her natural life, into her own hands, and not to another, whether claiming by her authority or otherwise, for her sole and separate use, and upon her separate receipts, without power of anticipation, and excluding all right of interest in, or power over, the same of any husband she may have, or any liability for his debts, contracts, or engagements." It then provides for the disposition of the property after her death. It is conceded that the debt was contracted by Mrs. McGill with direct reference to her separate estate, and that it was her intention to charge the same. The testimony on that point is ample, under the decisions of this court, to charge any separate estate she had with this debt, unless there be other reasons for its exemption.

It is contended, and the learned judge below so held, that, by reason of the provisions in the deed of trust above quoted, she had no power to charge or pledge the property held by James McEvoy, trustee. That being her only separate estate, so far as disclosed by the record, we are necessarily called upon to determine the effect of those provisions. Cases involving the right to place restrictions upon the alienation of property have been numerous, and have resulted in a great diversity of opinions between the courts that have passed upon the question. In England it has been persistently and steadfastly held that a gift or grant of a beneficial fee simple or life estate, whether legal or equitable, carried with it the right of the donee or grantee, other than a married woman, to alienate the estate, and charge it with his debts; and that all attempts to restrict these incidents belonging to such estates, by forbidding payment of the income to anyone other than the donee or grantee, or prohibiting anticipation, were nugatory and without effect, except by way of cesser or limitation over of the estate. We will have occasion to consider the exception in favor of married women later on. In 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 5, there is a very excellent note on the subject of "Spendthrift Trusts," where it can be seen how widely the courts of this country have differed on the main question. But it would serve no good purpose to enter into a discussion of those cases, as this court held in the case of Smith v. Towers, 69 Md. 77 and 91, that the founder of a trust may lawfully provide, in direct terms, that his property shall go to his beneficiary to the exclusion of the alienees and creditors of the latter; and accordingly it was determined that the rents and profits held by the trustee in that case, which the testator directed should be paid into the hands of his son, and "not into the hands of another, whether claiming by his authority or otherwise," could not be reached by his creditors, either at law or in equity, before such rents and profits were paid to him. It was conceded that the English cases, as well as many in this country, were opposed to the views adopted by this court; but it was held that the reasons on which was founded the rule that the right to sell and dispose of property is a necessary incident to the ownership of it do not apply to the transfer of property in trust. It was said that "the donor or deviser, as the absolute owner of the property, has the right to prescribe the terms on which his bounty shall be enjoyed, unless such terms be repugnant to the law. . . . The creditors of the beneficiary have no right to complain, because the founder of the trust did not give his bounty to them." By the will before the court in the case of Reed v. Safe Deposit & T. Co. 86 Md. —, 88 Atl. 899, the testator left his property to trustees, who were succeeded by the appellee in that case, with directions that they should pay the net proceeds from time to time, to his wife during her natural life, "and especially so that the same shall not be liable for the debts or contracts of any future husband, or in any manner subject to his control, or to be taken in execution or attachment or otherwise howsoever, and so that she shall not pledge or anticipate said property or said net proceeds of income, or any part thereof." We held that, by virtue of those provisions, the net income from the property in the hands of the trustee was not liable for her debts, and that the testator had full power to make such provisions, under the decision in Smith v. Towers.

But whether one who is the owner of property can thus place it beyond his own control and power of alienation, especially beyond the reach of his creditors, presents another question. The case of Warner v. Rice, 66 Md. 436, goes very far towards denying such right. George Warner and others conveyed to a trustee certain property which had been left them by their father by a deed in which certain trusts were declared by the grantors. The property of George Warner sought to be made liable to attachment in that case, had by the deed been made subject to a declaration of trust, as follows: "In trust for the use and benefit of said George Warner and his immediate family, free from liability for any of his debts, contracts, or engagements; and when, if so by said trustee found requisite, by him deemed proper, to apply the uses, rents, income, and profits to the support and maintenance of said George and his said family, during his, said George's, life," etc. This court held that the exemption attempted to be conferred upon the use of the property by that declaration was void and without effect, being contrary to law, and held the rents from Warner's equitable estate in the ground rents attached liable for the plaintiff's debts. It was said in that case that a beneficial legal estate in fee or for life could not be conveyed or devised to a person with a provision that it should not be alienated or subject to the debts of the legal owner, and it was also stated that, as a general principle, equitable estates cannot be effectually created with such provisos, except in the case of trusts created for the protection and benefit of married women. In Baker v. Keiser, 75 Md. 383, the cases of Smith v. Towers and Warner v. Rice were discussed, and it was said that in the latter case this court "emphatically declared that it was wholly against the policy of the law to allow property, whether legal or equitable, to be fettered by restraints upon alienation; and, generally, the court said: 'Whenever property is subject to alienation by the owner, it is subject to his debts.'" It was stated in that opinion that the majority of the court concluded in Smith v. Towers that there was nothing in the decision of Warner v. Rice "which should restrain this court from saying that the founder of the trust could, by sufficiently clear language, create a trust for a beneficiary without the power of alienation;" but the opinion concluded by saying that "this court went as far as it could in Towers' Case to effect the intention of the testator which was so expressly declared; but proper adherence to the policy of the law in the state will not allow the extension of the doctrine of the Towers Case beyond the limitations of that decision, nor to a case not falling clearly within its reasons and reasoning." But the case of Warner v. Rice is clearly distinguishable from that of Smith v. Towers and Reed v. Safe-Deposit & T. Co. inasmuch as in that case there was an attempt of the owner of the property to place it beyond the reach of his creditors, and yet retain the enjoyment of it during his life, while in the other two cases the testators were creating trusts in favor of third persons. The theory upon which courts have held restraints upon alienation, etc., valid is that the cestui que trust only has what the donor has given him,—is the recipient of his bounty; and therefore, if the donor has not given him the right to alienate the property or made it subject to the payment of his debts, no one has the right to complain. As is well said in Broadway Nat.

Bank v. Adams, 133 Mass. 170, 43 Am. Rep. 504: "Under our system, creditors may reach all the property of the debtor not exempted by law, but they cannot enlarge the gift of the founder of a trust, and take more than he has given." This is well illustrated in the Missouri cases. In Lampert v. Haydel, 96 Mo. 439, 2 L. R. A. 118, and in Partridge v. Casender, 96 Mo. 452, the doctrine had been distinctly announced that by the use of apt terms a testator could forbid the alienation of property in trust, and could place it beyond the reach of the creditors of the beneficiary; but in Bank of Commerce v. Chambers, 96 Mo. 459, a husband who had released his curtesy in his wife's estate, accepting in lieu thereof an income given him by her will, was regarded as a purchaser of such income, and not a mere recipient of his wife's bounty, and therefore the income was held to be subject to the claims of his creditors, notwithstanding the provisions in the will to the contrary. In referring to Lampert v. Haydel that court said that it, "and the class to which it belongs, rest in a large part upon the distinct ground that a creditor is not defrauded, and therefore has no cause of complaint, because the owner of property in the free exercise of his will so disposes of it that the object of his bounty, who parts with nothing in return, has a sufficient income provided for and applied to his life support." Even that class of cases should be carefully guarded, and courts should not be inclined to exempt property from its usual incidents of the right of alienation and liability for debts unless the language of the donor be free from doubt. But it is going too far, and is too violently assailing the policy of the law of this state, as indicated above, to permit a person to convey property owned by him to a trustee, and still retain full enjoyment of the income and revenues from it, through the instrumentality of the trustee and yet have the interest he retains for himself, worth, it may be, thousands or tens of thousands of dollars per annum, so fettered by his own act that it cannot be disposed of or be reached by his creditors. It is true that our land records are open to the public, and, in contemplation of law, what is properly recorded therein is presumed to be known by all; yet the fact remains that if a person has once owned property, and continues to occupy it or use it just as he has always done, it would occur to but few persons, if any, at least in ordinary transactions, that he must inquire, perhaps employ counsel to ascertain, whether there had been any change in the legal status of such property. It may be argued that this may happen in the cases we have already said are lawful in this state, where the bounty is bestowed upon third persons, and to some extent that may be true, but in those cases persons dealing with them may perhaps be expected to ascertain what the party receives,—what interest in the property was given to him; but in the case before us he would not only have to find out what property he owned in the beginning, but from time to time examine the records to see whether the former and still ostensible owner of it continued to retain any interest that was liable for his debts. It cannot be denied that property is deprived of some of its greatest value to the community in which it is held or located when beyond the power of alienation or reach of the creditors of its present owners. To hold that a grantor can retain all the use and enjoyment of his property for life, "free from the incidents of property, and not subject to his debts, would be a dangerous and startling proposition to sanction." We do not think it can be sustained by reason or authority. So far as we are aware, the authorities are the other way. Warner v. Rice, 66 Md. 436; 4 Kent, Com. 311; Mackason's Appeal, 42 Pa. 380, 82 Am. Dec. 517; Ghormley v. Smith, 189 Pa. 584, 11 L. R. A. 565; McIlvaine v. Smith, 42 Mo. 45, 97 Am. Dec. 295 (approved as to this point in Lampert v. Haydel, 96 Mo. 489, 3 L. R. A. 113; Pacific Nat. Bank v. Windram, 183 Mass. 175; Jackson v. Von Zedlitz, 186 Mass. 842.

But, conceding this to be the law as to those who are sui juris, how far does it apply to married women or to a deed made by one in contemplation of marriage? That is the important and most difficult question before us. The doctrine of the separate estate of a married woman was purely a creature of equity, and worked a radical change in the principles of the common law applicable to the marital relation, as affecting the rights of property between husband and wife. In Buckton v. Hay, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 645, the master of the rolls said that "it was considered that to give it her without such a restraint would be practically to give it to her husband, and therefore, to prevent this, a condition was allowed to be imposed restraining her from anticipating her income, and thus fettering the free alienation;" and in Tullet v. Armstrong, 4 Myl. & C. 377, Lord Chancellor Cottenham said: "The separate estate and the prohibition of anticipation are equally creatures of equity, and equally inconsistent with the ordinary rules of property. The one is only a restriction and qualification of the other. The two must stand or fall together." And again: "It being once settled that a wife might enjoy separate estate as a feme sole, the laws of property attached to this new estate; and it was found, as part of such law, that the power of alienation belonged to the wife, and was destructive of the security intended for it. Equity again interfered, and by another violation of the laws of property, supported the validity of the prohibition against alienation." In other words, the reason that the English courts permitted these restrictions on property of a married woman, although they had denied their validity as against the property of persons sui juris, was that her right to hold property free from her husband's control was created for her by courts of equity, and the chancellors thought she was not sufficiently protected from her husband without this restraint. It was very reluctantly done, and only because it was deemed necessary for the protection of wives from their husbands, as a study of the English cases will show. What we have said above in regard to these restraints imposed by third persons will, of course, apply to a married woman when she is the recipient of the bounty of another; but we cannot consent to the establishment of a doctrine in this state which will enable a married woman, or a woman in contemplation of marriage, to place her property that would be otherwise responsible for debts contracted with reference to it beyond the reach of her creditors, and still enjoy the use and benefit of it as fully and completely as she had done before. We do not mean to intimate that she cannot so settle her separate property as to place it beyond the control and reach of her husband and his creditors, but when the rights of her creditors are involved, and the property in question be of the character that would be liable to such creditors but for such restraints, she should not be permitted to escape the payment of her just debts by reason of her own declaration that such property should not be liable for her debts, or that the income should be paid to her alone and not to another, notwithstanding it is made a matter of record before the debts are contracted. There is no necessity to establish such a doctrine for her protection against her husband, as, under the laws of this state, she has ample protection against him and his creditors, and we do not "assume, that husbands will be constantly endeavoring to wrest their wives' property from them, and devote it to their own uses." Cooke v. Husbands, 11 Md. 505; Olivet v. Whitworth, 82 Md. 262. Separate estates were created in equity because married women could hold no other. As the husband at common law became the absolute owner of the wife's personal property and of the rents and profits of her real estate during coverture, she was not liable for debts, or, to speak more accurately, she could not contract them. When, therefore, chancellors created an estate that she could hold and dispose of, and which was liable for her debts, if contracted with reference to it, by going a step further, and permitting restraints on alienation and anticipation, they did not place the property in a worse position, so far as the debts of married women were concerned, than it was before the equitable separate estate was created. But, under our laws, a married woman may not only have an equitable separate estate, but by statute she may acquire property by purchase, gift, grant, devise, bequest, descent, in course of distribution, or, as amended in 1892, in any other manner, and, however obtained, it is protected from the debts of her husband. Such property she holds for her separate use, with power of devising it as fully as if she were a feme sole, and she may convey it by joint deed with her husband. It is not necessary for her to have a trustee to secure her the sole and separate use of her property, but, if she desires it, she can appoint one by deed, her husband joining with her, or she can apply to a court of equity, and have one appointed. The husband and wife may jointly charge her statutory separate property in the same way that she could charge her equitable separate estate, even by a parol contract, and courts of equity have the power to enforce the one as well as the other. Wingert v. Gordon, 86 Md. 106, and cases there cited. She may be sued at law, on a note, bill of exchange, single bill, bond, contract, or agreement, executed jointly with her husband. Property earned by her skill, industry, or personal labor, as well as the income therefrom, is held by her to her sole and separate use, with power as a feme sole to dispose of it, and it is liable for debts incurred by her about such business. In short, the tendency of our legislation is to greatly enlarge both her powers and liabilities, although it carefully protects her property from her husband and his creditors, so that now many of the reasons for decisions rendered in the past century, or the early part of the present one, can no longer have much force under our changed conditions. This particular question was not passed upon by this court when we still had the conditions to meet that originally influenced the English courts, and as we are now called upon for the first time to decide it, at a time when the policy of the state is so radically different in its dealing with married women from what it formerly was, we do not feel called upon to be governed by reasons no longer applicable, and make an exception in favor of married women, or those in contemplation of marriage, especially as it might result in creating a privileged class, which would not reflect credit upon the law that created it nor the state that fostered it. Property is too easily transferred from husband to wife to permit her to do what he is prohibited from doing, because it is contrary to the policy of the law, calculated to tempt his honesty, and to impose upon and deceive those dealing with him. If the wife is at the mercy of and under the absolute control of the husband, as seems to be the moving cause of the English courts when they supported the validity of the prohibition against alienation in her favor, then he can with great facility make use of her to do what he himself cannot do, if we hold she can place such restraints on her property. He would only be required to convey the property to her, and let her place such restraints on it as he desired, to make it impregnable against the assault of creditors, although he could not do it himself as long as the property was his own, because he was sui juris. Would not the result of such a decision be that a married man who wanted to have such restraints on his property could convey it to his wife, and thus accomplish indirectly, through his wife, what he could not do directly?

Without meaning to say that the facts and reasoning are in all respects applicable, the Massachusetts and Pennsylvania cases are more in accord with our views of the proper doctrine to establish as the law of this state on this question than the English cases are. See Pacific Nat. Bank v. Windram, 188 Mass. 175; Jackson v. Von Zedlitz, 186 Mass. 342; and Ghormley v. Smith, 189 Pa. 584, 11 L. R. A. 565,—in which the courts of those states have passed on the general subject, as well as on the proposed exception in favor of married women. In the case of Reid v. Safe Deposit & T. Co. 86 Md. —, 88 Atl. 899, this court, after referring to Brandon v. Robinson, 18 Ves. Jr. 494; Buckton v. Hay, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 645; and Tullett v. Armstrong, 4 Myl. & C. 877, to show the views of the English courts, said: "It thus appears that the exception in case of devises and settlements upon married women was deemed necessary only because of the general rule that restraints upon alienation and anticipation were always regarded as repugnant to the estate. But in Maryland this 39 L. R. A.

is not the general rule." And then, after quoting from Smith v. Towers, to show what the law is here, it was said: "In this state, therefore, where the law is as just stated, it is difficult to perceive why trusts in cases of married women do not stand on the same footing as other trusts of the same nature." Although this precise question was not involved in that case, we strongly intimated that we differed from the English decisions which applied a different rule in favor of trusts to married women from that applied to other trusts of the same nature, and we are of opinion that the rule which we have above laid down for persons who are sui juris is equally applicable to them. The income from the property in the hands of the trustee is therefore liable in equity to the payment of the debt due the appellant. We have not thought it necessary to advert to the fact that the deed was made when Mrs. McGill was single, as it seems to have been practically conceded that it was made in contemplation of marriage, or that her husband departed this life after the debt was contracted and after this suit was brought.

The decree will be reversed, and the cause remanded, in order that the lower court may pass a decree requiring the trustee to pay out of the income now in his hands, or that may hereafter come into his hands, the amount due on the note of Mrs. McGill, together with the costs in this court and the court below.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Washington County in favor of defendant in a suit brought to enforce specific performance of a contract to convey land. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry Kyd Douglas, for appellant:

The act of 1890 was passed for the benefit of the state exclusively and for revenue raising, and the state only by a direct proceeding after hearing the delinquent company can condemn such delinquency.

Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 4 Gill & J. 120; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 581; 5 Thomp. Corp. § 6598; Regents of the University v. Williams, 9 Gill & J. 424, 31 Am. The doctrine is of still stronger force where the action is in a court of equity.

5 Thomp. Corp. § 6598; Soc. for Establishing Useful Manufactures v. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. 1 N. J. Eq. 157, 21 Am. Dec. 41; Hamilton v. Annapolis & E. Ridge R. Co. 1 Md. Ch. 107; *Baltimore & P. But the complainant did pay the bonus required by the act of 1890, although not promptly; and the state received it without objection and gave the usual receipt for it.

The state thereby waived any cause of complaint it had against the complainant company for its delay, and took no action in the matter.

The defendants can occupy no better position than the state. If the state waives a penalty the defendants cannot enforce it.

The defendants were large stockholders in the complainant corporation,—although the cash they were to pay for their stock never made its appearance,—and took part in its management. Can they be heard now to set up a defense in this action, such as the one we have discussed? Will not the court hold them estopped? They lived in Hagerstown and knew what was going on. Not having paid a cent on their stock, can they be permitted to stand by and see this large building go up and then when the time comes to make a deed of the lot say "No, you owed the state $87.60 and didn't pay it in time and we'll hold on to the lot and freeze on to the buildings, too."

Morrison v. Dorsey, 48 Md. 472; Hager v. Cleveland, 86 Md. 491.

Messrs. Alexander Armstrong, Samuel B. Loose, and Norman B. Scott, Jr., for appellee:

The plaintiff admits that at the time this suit was instituted it had not paid the first installment of the bonus. This admission should preclude the plaintiff from maintaining this action.

People, Bishop, v. Kingston & M. Turnp. Road Co. 23 Wend. 198, 35 Am. Dec. 556; Franklin P. Ins. Co. v. Hart, 31 Md. 59; Selma & T. R. Co. v. Tipton, 5 Ala. 787, 39 Am. Dec. 855.

The answer of the defendant is not in the nature of an information; it does not allege breach of corporate power, but only denies the legal existence and corporate power of this plaintiff. It submits that as no corporate franchise existed, none could be forfeited. For if the general laws of the state require certain acts to be done before a corporation comes into being, such requirements should be scrupulously observed. And should there be any vital omission, such omission can be taken advantage of collaterally.

Assn.* 37 Md. 825; Agnew v. Bank of Gettysburg, 2 Harr. & G. 498.

Pearce, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill was filed in this case September 19, 1892, by the appellant, against the appellee, for the specific performance of an agreement to convey land, made in writing between the appellee on the one part and O. C. Knipe and others on the other part, who subsequently assigned all their interest in said agreement to the appellant, with the consent, as it alleges, of the appellee. The appellee answered the bill, admitting the execution of the agreement, but alleging various defenses to the bill, among which is a denial of the existence of the appellant as duly incorporated under the laws of Maryland, and a denial of its right to maintain this suit by reason of its failure to comply with the provisions of chapter 536 of the Acts of 1890. The general replication was filed, and a mass of testimony was taken, and the bill was dismissed by the court below (Judge Stake) on the ground that the appellant had no legal existence as a corporation, and was, therefore not entitled to maintain the suit. Under the agreed statement of facts upon which this appeal was brought into this court, the sole question for review is the right of the appellant to maintain this suit without having first paid the tax of $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent on the capital stock of the company in the manner provided by act 1890, chap. 536. The statement of facts admits that both the appellant and the appellee are incorporated in Washington county under the laws of Maryland, and that the agreement sought to be enforced is correctly set forth in the record. It also admits that at the time the bill was filed the appellant had not paid, and had not been notified to pay, the first instalment of bonus as per chapter 536, Acts 1890, but that it did on the 18th of May, 1893, pay the same to the controller of the state. The record does not show the date when this statement of facts was made or filed but the reference therein to the opinion of the court dismissing the bill which was filed June 1, 1897, shows it was made and filed after that date. This is only important to show that the admission of appellant's due incorporation can only be regarded as an admission of incorporation at that date, June, 1897.

It will thus be seen the question before the court is a narrow one. In the answer, the agreed statement of facts, and in the opinion of the court below, as well as in the argument in this court, the case was regarded as depending wholly upon the construction of chapter 536, Acts 1890, and, if this were the fact, there would be less difficulty in reaching a satisfactory conclusion. But the act of 1894 (chap. 114) deals with the same precise subject matter, and if it can be said it does not repeal the act of 1890, it yet materially changes the law applicable to cases arising under the act of 1890, and we are required to consider and construe the act of 1894. It will be seen that the titles of these acts are in precisely the same words, except that the act of 1890 is, "An Act to Add a [One] New Section to Article Eighty-One of the Code, . . . to be Designated as Section Eighty-Eight A," while the act of 1894 is, "An Act to Add Six New Sections to Article Eighty-One of the Code, . . . to be Designated as Sections Eighty-Eight," F. G. H. I. J; and that the word "corporation" is used in the title of the latter act where the word "company" is used in the title of the former. The act of 1894 specifically provides that no corporation incorporated prior to the date of the passage of that act shall in any manner, by that act, be relieved or released from the payment of any bonus due under the act of 1890; and this proviso, taken in connection with the repealing clause in § 2 of that act, clearly indicates the legislative purpose to repeal the future operation of the act of 1890, while saving all remedies and results by reason of the nonpayment of any bonus by any corporation incorporated prior to the passage of that act. It should be noted here that chapter 244, Acts 1890, adds five new sections to article 81 of the Code, to come in after § 88, and to be designated as §§ 88 A, B, C, D, and E. These sections deal only with taxes on the assessed value of the shares of capital stock of corporations, and not with the bonus tax. Then came chapter 536, Acts 1890, which added one new section to article 81 of the Code, to come in after § 88, and to be designated 88A, so that under these two acts there were two sections each design-nated 88A. It is thus made evident that the draftsman of chapter 114, Acts 1894, with these two acts of 1890 before him, and intending to avoid the existing confusion arising from the designating of two sections as 88A, designed to repeal act 1890, chap. 536, and to substitute § 88A of that act for § 88A of act 1890, chap. 536, leaving § 88A-E; chap. 244, Acts 1890, to stand in their regular order of precedence. Montel v. Consolidation Coal Co. 39 Md. 171, 174. The appellant was incorporated prior to May 18, 1893, since it paid the first instalment of bonus tax on that date, but it appears from the examination of the act of 1894 that the proceeding prescribed therein for the recovery of the bonus tax upon corporations, and the provisions setting forth the result of nonpayment, are applicable as well to corporations created before as after the passage of that act, and that, if there is anything to be found in that act not contained in the act of 1890 which would sustain the appellant's right to maintain this suit, it is entitled to the benefit thereof. Comparing chapter 244, Acts 1890, with chapter 114, Acts 1894, it is evident that the draftsman of the act of 1894, overlooking the true theory and design of the act of 1890 (chapter 536), or deliberately intending to alter its true theory and design, substantially provided the same remedy and procedure for the recovery of the bonus tax as was, by chapter 244 of 1890, provided for the recovery of the tax, upon the assessed value of capital stock; and it is now argued by the appellant, since the oral argument, that, as the act of 1894 subjects the corporation to suit by the state for the recovery of this bonus tax, it necessarily follows that the corporation has a legal existence for all purposes, and therefore full capacity to sue. But with this contention, however plausible and forcible the argument at first blush, we are not able, after full and careful consideration, to agree; and we are of opinion that, if the appellant would be held incapable of maintaining this suit under the act of 1890, it must be so held under the act of 1894. To hold otherwise, and to hold, as the appellant urges, that this act recognizes a corporation which has not paid the bonus tax when due as an existing, moving, active corporation for all purposes, would be to strike with absolute nullity the plain and imperative language of section 88F, which declares that no such corporation shall have or exercise any corporate powers until such bonus has been paid. It is settled law that charters or statutes conferring franchises on a corporation are to be construed in favor of the public, rather than the corporation; and to gratify this rule where the charter, as here, is under a certificate, the general law is to be read into the certificate. Every word, phrase, or sentence doubtful or ambiguous is to be interpreted in favor of the state. Thompson, in his work on Corporations (vol. 4, § 5661), says: "The rule is simple. That which the company may do by its charter it may do. Beyond that its acts are illegal."

In Roland Park Co. v. State, 80 Md. 443, Acts 1890, chap. 536, and Acts 1894, chap. 114, were considered on another point, and it was said: "What we have to do is to discover the legislative intention and to give to it, when ascertained in accordance with established canons or rules, full and complete effect. . . . This intent or design may be gathered, not merely from the language of the enactment, but also from the causes or necessity which prompted its passage. . . . A result which may follow from one construction or another of a statute is always a potent factor and is sometimes in and of itself conclusive as to the correct solution of the question as to its meaning." One result which might follow the establishment of appellant's contention would be that corporations defaulting under this act might not only continue in the full exercise of the prohibited powers for two years after such default, but might before the expiration of that period, dispose of all their property, and leave the state a barren judgment for this bonus. Such a result could not have been within the legislative contemplation, and ought not to be permitted if it can be avoided by any sound construction of the whole act. It is a cardinal rule of construction that, where one part of a statute is susceptible of two constructions, and the language of another part is clear and definite, and is consistent with one of such constructions and opposed to the other, that construction which will, under all clauses of the statute, be harmonious, must be adopted. Magruder v. Carroll, 4 Md. 348, 349; Alexander v. Worthington, 5 Md. 472. Sections 88F and 88H must be construed together, and by so doing § 88F must be taken to prohibit generally the having or exercising of any corporate powers before payment of the bonus, which would include generally suits by or against the corporation; and the office of § 88H is merely an exception withdrawing from the general purview and operation of § 88F the particular suit authorized for the recovery of the bonus tax by § 88H. Every corporation is the mere creature of the state, and where neither its charter nor any statute restricts the powers through which it maintains itself and responds to the discharge of its obligations, it may be conceded that the right to sue and the liability to respond to a suit are correlative; but the state which creates the corporation is sovereign, and, while withholding from the corporation or suspending the right to sue before compliance with a revenue measure, as the price of the exercise by it of corporate powers, may clearly, if it see fit, subject such corporation to suit by the state for noncompliance with such condition precedent; and we think the court below correctly and clearly stated the law when it said: "The effect of the law is to hold in abeyance the right and remedy of the suing corporation,"—and we are of opinion that this proposition is as clear under the provisions of chapter 114, Acts 1894, as it is under chapter 538, Acts 1890.

The appellant contended that the validity of its incorporation is conceded in the agreed statement of facts, but, even if this would affect the result, we do not so understand the concession. It is expressly denied in the answer, and the agreed statement of facts was entered into after payment of the bonus, when its corporate power to sue was no longer held in abeyance, and when the right to sue was complete under the statute.

The next contention of the appellant is that the question of corporate power cannot be raised collaterally, or in any way except by a direct proceeding by the state to forfeit the charter. There is, of course, no doubt that mere causes of forfeiture cannot be taken advantage of collaterally, and that, where the right to sue has once become vested in the corporation by compliance with all conditions precedent thereto, it can only be divested by forfeiture in some legal mode of the charter. But this case does not come within that rule. We have carefully examined all the cases cited by the appellant, and it will be found that all of them are cases merely of irregularity, and not of nullity; cases in which the power to sue had become a vested power under the charter by a substantial compliance in good faith with the requirements thereof, notwithstanding some irregularity in the proceedings thereunder. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 4 Gill & J. 122, was the case of nonuser of corporate powers, and Chief Justice Buchanan was careful to say: "Where there is an existing corporation capable of acting, . . . cause of forfeiture can only be enforced by scire facias, or a quo warranto, issued at the instance of the government creating the corporation, and cannot be taken advantage of incidentally, or in any other way, or by any individual, since the government, with which alone the contract arising out of the charter is made, may waive the breach of any condition of that contract, and cannot be made to enforce the forfeiture, whether it will or not." But here the state has, by the act of 1890, passed before the incorporation of the appellant, declared its will that, until compliance with the fundamental condition which was disregarded in this case, the appellant should have no other or greater corporate power than he would have had after forfeiture enforced; and this legislative limitation of power is as effective for the purposes of this case as a decree of forfeiture made prior to the suit.

Regents of the University v. Williams, 9 Gill & J. 426, 81 Am. Dec. 72, was a question whether one corporation was merged in another, and the court held that neither non-user nor misuser of corporate franchises would authorize granting the same franchises to others, before a forfeiture had been judicially declared, and Chief Justice Buchanan was again careful to say: "Scire facias . . . is the proper process when there is a legally existing body capable of acting, but who have abused their power. . . . [And] quo warranto, which properly applies, where there is a corporate body de facto only, but who take upon themselves to act, though, from some defect in their constitution or organization, they cannot legally exercise their powers." So with Planters' Bank v. Bank of Alexandria, 10 Gill & J. 346, where it was contended that the charter of the Planters' Bank, under one of its sections, by reason of the suspension of specie payments, became ipso facto null and void, without judicial inquiry upon the subject; but the court held proceeding by scire facias necessary.

The following cases, cited by appellant: Taggart v. Western Maryland R. Co. 24 Md. 566, 89 Am. Dec. 760; Busey v. Hooper, 85

Md. 30, 6 Am. Rep. 350; Hagerstown Turnp. Road v. Creeger, 5 Harr. & J. 122, 9 Am. Dec. 495; Hamilton v. Annapolis & E. Ridge R. Co. 1 Md. Ch. 107; Keene v. Van Reuth, 48 Md. 194; Musgrave v. Morrison, 54 Md. 166,—will all be found on examination to be governed by the principles applied in Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 4 Gill & J. 1, and are all cases of legally existing bodies capable of acting, and which had in good faith attempted to comply with all legal requirements precedent thereto. On the other hand, the decisions in Maryland have always been that the legal existence of a corporation is always open to inquiry. Agnew v. Bank of Gattysburg, 2 Harr. & G. 498; Lyons v. Orange, A. & M. R. Co. 33 Md. 18, in which the court speaks of "conditions . . . which, by the express provisions of the statute, are made a condition to be performed . . . before and as a foundation of the exercise of powers and privileges under the charter." Also Hammond v. Slaus, 58 Md. 12; Smith v. Silver Valley Min. Co. 64 Md. 94, 54 Am. Rep. 760; Bonaparte v. Baltimore, H. & L. R. R. Co. 75 Md. 847; Lord v. Essex Bldg. Assn. 37 Md. 325,—in which it is said (citing Ang. & A. Corp. § 83): "There is certainly no doubt . . . that, where a corporation is created by statute, or under a general statute, as in this case, which requires certain acts to be done before it can be considered in esse, there those acts must appear to have been done, in order to establish the corporate existence." We find nothing in Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 137 U. S. 563, 34 L. ed. 784, in conflict with the law laid down in the Maryland cases just cited; and in Eaton v. Aspinwall, 19 N. Y. 121, relied on by the appellant, the language of the act was not that 10 per cent of the capital stock should be paid in "before it should be a corporation," but that, "where the certificate was filed, and 10 per cent of the stock paid in, it should be a body politic." But, even if it be conceded that the legal construction put by the appellant upon the language used is a correct construction, that case could not be accepted as controlling in the face of our own decisions, and when compared with other cases in New York. In Williams v. Bank of Michigan, 7 Wend. 589, Chancellor Walworth said: "A contract made with the company by that name is neither an admission or any evidence whatever that it is entitled to sue by that name as a corporation aggregate." And in Welland Canal Co. v. Hathaway, 8 Wend. 480, 24 Am. Dec. 51, Judge Nelson said: When a corporation sues as such "if they have not the powers and privileges assumed on their part in their dealings with him, it is their own fault, and not his. Whether they had these powers must have been known to themselves: not to the defendant, and no act of his could legally add to or detract from them. Why, then, should he be estopped from denying their corporate capacity, or they be excused from establishing it by legal evidence, when they are endeavoring to enforce their rights in a manner, and before a tribunal, which can entertain their suit only upon the proof or assumption that they are a corporate body, duly constituted by competent authority." In Feld v. Cooks, 16

La. Ann. 153, it was held that the recognition of defendant as a company by the plaintiffs did not preclude them from showing that defendant had no legal existence as a corporation; and that, to produce an estoppel, there should be at least an admission that the company was entitled to exercise corporate powers. Thompson, in his work on Corporations, vol. 5, (§ 6586), while admitting a regrettable conflict of judicial opinion upon this question, says that those decisions which hold that corporations can enjoy franchises while repudiating conditions upon which they are conferred unless the state is worried into judicial proceeding to oust them "are inexcusable," and he says, in § 6587: "The sound doctrine is that, where a statute creating a corporation declares that, unless the corporation performs certain acts within a prescribed time, its corporate existence and powers shall cease, or its powers and franchises shall terminate, the statute executes itself . . . without the necessity of any further action by the state, either by a legislative declaration of forfeiture or by a judgment of forfeiture in a judicial proceeding. In such a case" its legal existence "is a fact in pais," to be ascertained in any judicial proceeding, direct or collateral. It is laid down in 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 778, that the doctrine of estoppel cannot be successfully invoked unless the corporation has a de facto existence; and Judge Cooley, in Swartwout v. Michigan Air Line R. Co. 24 Mich. 393, says: "Where there is a corporation de facto with no want of legislative power to its due and legal existence . . . in controversies between the de facto corporation and those who have entered into contract relations with it, . . . and [where] the questions suggested are only whether there has been exact regularity and strict compliance with the provisions of the law relating to incorporation, . . . such questions should not be suffered to be raised."

In Johnson v. Hines, 61 Md. 180, this court has said, speaking of the invalidity of a mortgagee's title derived from a trustee's deed made without ratification of the sale, but after ratification of an audit: "There is a marked and important distinction between nullities and irregularities. An irregularity may be waived; a nullity never can be waived." In recognition of this fundamental principle, the exact question raised here was decided in the recent case of Jones v. Aspen Hardware Co. 21 Colo. 283, 29 L. R. A. 143. This was an action of replevin by the company to recover a stock of goods. The statute in that case provided that every corporation incorporated under any general or special law should pay the state a fee, to be graded according to its capital stock, to be due and payable upon the filing of the certificate of incorporation, and that no such corporation should have or exercise any corporate powers until such fee should have been paid; and it was held that an association, having failed to comply with the statute with respect to the payment of the fee, was neither a de jure nor a de facto corporation, and was not competent to maintain a suit as such. The court said: "The language of the act is plain and unambiguous. . . . The doctrine of estoppel cannot be successfully invoked, we think, unless the corporation has at least a de facto existence."

... A de facto corporation can never be recognized in violation of a positive law. . . . There is a broad distinction between those acts made necessary by the statute as a prerequisite to the exercise of corporate powers and those acts required of individuals seeking incorporation, but not made prerequisite to the exercise of such powers." These principles were clearly recognized and applied in Boyce v. Towson Town Station of M. E. Church Trustees, 46 Md. 373, 374, where the court said: "The statute law of the state expressly requiring certain prescribed acts to be done to constitute a corporation, to permit parties indirectly, or upon the principle of estoppel, virtually to create a corporation for any purpose, or to have acts so construed, would be in manifest opposition to the statute law and clearly against its policy, and justified upon no sound principle in the administration of justice.

Nor can we agree that the subsequent payment of this bonus is equivalent to its payment before the commencement of the suit. We think it clear that the right of action must be complete before the action is brought, and the subsequent occurrence of a material fact will not avail in maintaining it. Dean v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co., 119 N. Y. 545; Hollingsworth v. Flint, 101 U. S. 598, 25 L. ed. 1029; Baker v. Tillman, 84 Ga. 401. If the plaintiff is not itself incapacitated to sue, and yet cannot maintain the particular suit because the right of action did not accrue until after commencement of the suit, a fortiori should it be precluded from maintaining the suit where the inability is not a special one going to the particular suit but a general inability going to the maintenance of any suit at that particular time.

We find nothing in the authorities relied on by the appellant to overthrow the doctrine upon which this decision is placed, and we must affirm the decree appealed from.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Willis J. PERKINS, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Louis J. GROBBEN et al.

(.....Mich.....)

The retaking by a vendor, as owner, of property sold by conditional sale with a reservation of title, and the giving credit to the vendee for one half the invoice price of the property, retaining the instalments of purchase price paid, as the contract allowed, for the use of the property, will preclude an action for the balance of the purchase price on a note therefor, where this provides that the property may be retaken, and also that a suit on the note shall not waive the vendor's title to the property. منع

(March 15, 1898.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kent County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to enforce payment of notes representing the purchase price of shingle mill machinery which plaintiff had taken back upon breach by defendants of their contract. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wolcott & Ward, for plaintiff in error:

The parties had the right to contract to retain both remedies until plaintiff should obtain satisfaction.

Fuller v. Byrne, 102 Mich. 461; Tufts v. D'Arcambal, 85 Mich. 185, 12 L. R. A. 446; Vaughn v. McFadyen (Mich.) 68 N. W. 185.

The disposition of the courts is to construe contracts where possible so as not to provide for anything in the nature of a forfeiture.

Hays v. Jordan, 85 Ga. 741, 9 L. R. A. 873; Preston v. Whitney, 23 Mich. 260.

The contract plainly provides for the preservation to plaintiff of both remedies. It is expressly provided that suit may be commenced on such notes and that such suits shall not be a waiver of the vendor's title to the property.

The vendor having retained two remedies must be satisfied on receiving full compensation, and the fair inference is that the clause providing for the application of payments for the use, wear, and tear would be inapplicable in case the vendor received satisfaction in full from the pursuit of either remedy.

This construction, while doing full justice to the vendor, is for the benefit of the vendee, and is the logical conclusion of the provisions of the contract retaining both remedies in the vendor.

Not only this, it is a construction which will prevent any forfeiture, and if, in a proper case, forfeitures under this class of contracts can be successfully questioned, which seems quite probable, then it is the only construction which will give to all parts of the contract force and meaning, and is therefore the proper construction for that reason.

Thirby v. Rainbow, 98 Mich. 164; Preston v. Whitney, 23 Mich. 260; New Home Sewing Mach. Co. v. Bolhane, 70 Mich. 443; Johnston v. Whittemore, 27 Mich. 463.

To hold the vendees personally for the debt is necessarily inconsistent with the right to forfeit any money already paid.

This is the construction vendees would be entitled to, and they cannot deny to vendor the same construction.

The provisions in the contract for several remedies are not put in the alternative, but the vendor may retake the property and he may commence suit.

Tufts v. D'Arcambal, 85 Mich. 185, 12 L. R. A. 446.

The courts will not concern themselves with the question of the wisdom of such contracts, and a recovery may be had for the purchase price of an article before the title has passed to the vendee if the parties had so contracted.

NOTE.—As to rights and liabilities of the parties on default under conditional sale, see note to Cole v. Hines (Md.) 32 L. R. A. 455.

White v. Solomon, 164 Mass. 516, 30 L. R. A. 587; Beach's Appeal, 58 Conn. 464; Vaughn v. McFadyen (Mich.) 68 N. W. 135.

Retaking the property will not necessarily amount to an election of remedies on the part of the vendor, nor cut off the right of the vendee to have the property on tendering performance of his contract.

Fuller v. Byrne, 102 Mich. 461; Tufts v. D'Arcambal, 85 Mich. 185, 12 L. R. A. 446; Vaughn v. McFadyen (Mich.) 68 N. W. 135; Dederick v. Wolfe, 68 Miss. 500; Montgomery Iron Works v. Smith, 98 Ala. 644; Hays v. Jordan, 85 Ga. 741, 9 L. R. A. 873; Brewer v. Ford, 54 Hun, 116; Acue v. Aultman, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) § 497; Durr v. Replogle, 167 Pa. 847; Mott v. Havana Nat. Bank, 22 Hun, 354; McPherson v. Acme Lumber Co. 70 Miss. 649; Matthews v. Lucia, 55 Vt. 808; Root v. Lord, 23 Vt. 568; Turner v. Smith, 7 Kulp, 139.

Retaking the property is not a rescission of the contract, but an act performed under and in affirmation of it.

Fairbanks v. Malloy, 16 Ill. App. 277; Latham v. Summer, 89 Ill. 233, 31 Am. Rep. 79.

Messrs. Pratt & Davis, for defendants in error:

Where a party gives a reason for his conduct and decision touching anything involved in a controversy, he cannot, after litigation has begun, change his ground, and put his conduct upon another and a different consideration. He is not permitted thus to mend his hold. He is estopped from doing it by a settled principle of law.

Ohio & M. R. Co. v. McCarthy, 96 U. S. 287, 24 L. ed. 696; Dreyfous v. Adams, 48 Cal. 131; Long v. Fox, 100 Ill. 43; McQueen v. Gamble, 83 Mich. 344; Callaway v. Johnson, 51 Mo. 33; Edwards's Appeal, 105 Pa. 103.

The taking of the property by plaintiff and crediting the value to the defendants, made the property his own, and he should now be held to that election, and should not be permitted to go in and claim relief entirely at variance therewith.

6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 250; Cole v. Hines, 81 Md. 476, 32 L. R. A. 455; Button v. Trader, 75 Mich. 298; Thomas v. Watt, 104 Mich. 206; Black v. Miller, 75 Mich. 323; Hinchman v. Weeks, 85 Mich. 535; McDonald v. Preston Nat. Bank (Mich.) 70 N. W. 143; Kunze v. Wixom, 89 Mich. 888; 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 32.

On default of payment the plaintiffs were not bound to accept the machine or take possession of it; they could have entered a judgment on the bond, levied on the machine and any other property of the defendant, in satisfaction of their demand. But they rescinded the contract by retaking into their possession the subject of it, which they had a right to do, and then immediately entered their bond and issued execution to levy on other property of defendant, which they had no right to do, for the contract or obligation to which the bond was collateral no longer existed.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1893 plaintiff received from defendants and filled an order for shingle-mill machinery to the amount of $2,600. Defendants paid thereon $800 in cash, and gave their notes for $300, $700, and $800. These notes all read alike, except the amounts and times of payment. The first one reads as follows:

Grand Rapids, Mich., Aug. 1, 1893.

June 15, 1894, after date, we promise to pay to the order of Perkins & Co. three hundred dollars, at Old National Bank, Grand Rapids, Mich.; value received; with interest at eight per cent per annum until due, and thereafter at eight per cent until paid. This note is one of three notes of even date, given for part purchase price of two Perkins & Co. Michigan Favorite shingle machines. . . . It is expressly agreed that the title and ownership of all said property shall remain in Perkins & Co. until the full purchase price is paid; and, in case of any default in the payment of this or any or either of said notes, all said notes shall, at the option of Perkins & Co., notice of which is hereby waived, become and be at once due and payable, and said property may be taken back by said Perkins & Co., and in such case all payments made, and amounts collected, on this or any of said notes, shall be deemed to be payments for the use, wear, and tear of the said property up to the retaking thereof. It is further expressly agreed that upon default in the payment of this or any or either of said notes Perkins & Co. may commence suit upon the same, which shall not be a waiver of Perkins & Co.'s title to said property, and the same may be retaken by them under this note, or any of said notes, upon default thereon, as hereinbefore provided. It is further agreed that no agreement in regard to said property made after this date, or new notes, collateral, or additional security, taken by Perkins & Co., shall in any way waive, transfer, or release their title to said property, it being expressly agreed that the title to said property shall, under all circumstances, remain in Perkins & Co. till this and all of said notes are canceled, and delivered up, or assigned by Perkins & Co. After maturity of any of said notes, Perkins & Co. may keep said property insured at maker's expense, premium of such insurance to be added to this note.

Groben & Hitchcock, per William Hitchcock.

Afterwards a chain was returned by consent of the plaintiff. The defendants not paying the notes, the plaintiff took possession of the machinery, and returned it to Grand Rapids. Plaintiff sent a statement to defendants crediting them with the amount of the machinery, taken at inventory price, less 50 per cent on account of being depreciated, the statement showing a balance due plaintiff of $1,176, accompanied by a letter reading as follows:

July 9, 1895.

Groben & Hitchcock, Leland, Mich.

Gentlemen: We have received and unloaded the shingle machinery, and carefully inspected the same, and inclose you herewith credit memorandum for the valuation we have placed on same. We also hand you herewith a statement of your account with us to date, after crediting you with the machinery received, as per inclosed credit memorandum. We ask you what is your pleasure in regard to the settlement of balance due? Owing to the ill treatment that we have received at your hands in regard to settlement of your account with us, we do not feel that you are entitled to any extended courtesies in regard to the payment of this balance. We should therefore be pleased to hear from you regarding the same by return mail, awaiting the favor of which we remain, very respectfully yours,

Perkins & Co., per Everhart.

Some statement is made in the brief of counsel as to what became of the machinery after it passed into the possession of plaintiff, but we are unable to find from the record what became of it. The defendants paid no attention to the letter of July 9, 1895. In August, 1896, this suit was begun by plaintiff, who declared upon all common accounts in assumpsit, with notice that under the money counts he would give in evidence the three notes in question. After the testimony was all in, the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendants, assigning as a reason that the exercise of the option to take the property was a satisfaction of the debt, the judge expressing himself as follows: "But the simple question to be determined now is whether or not the plaintiffs, having pursued one remedy, namely, by taking the property, resuming possession of it under their title, have waived all claims to enforce the note. That is the sole question that is to be determined now. I think it is proper to consider the other question in the same connection as bearing upon what should be the true interpretation of the contract. Then the contract further provides that, 'upon default in the payment of this, or any, or either of said notes, Perkins & Co. may commence suit upon the same, which shall not be a waiver of Perkins & Co.'s title to said property, and same may be retaken by them under this note, or any of said notes, upon default thereon as hereinbefore provided.' Now, there is a stipulation that the plaintiffs may commence suit upon these notes, and not thereby waive their right to resume possession under their title. But the converse of that proposition is not stated. It is not provided that they may take the property, and that shall not be any waiver of their right to sue and collect upon these notes. Now, is there not an implied waiver by virtue of the provision that is contained in it that covers the agreement in relation to the title to the property and the remedies under the contract? Now, the plaintiffs have taken possession of this property under a contract of this nature, which provides expressly that the title remains in them, and they may take possession on default, and that all payments previously made shall be applied as compensation for the use, wear, and tear. Is it not a proper inference, and is it not a proper conclusion of law, to say that, when they exercise that right under that contract to take the property, and apply what has been paid in that way, that it determines the whole matter? The law does not favor the enforcement of two remedies. The law recognizes the right of a party to secure his claim by as many securities as he can get; but it does not recognize his right to enforce more than one to complete satisfaction. I think the true interpretation of this contract is that the parties reserved the right to commence a suit, and provided that it should not be a waiver of their rights to take the property, but they did not reserve any right to sue and collect upon these notes after repossessing themselves of the property. And to allow that to be done would be to allow them to take the property which the law conclusively presumes under their contract was full payment, I think, of any balance that might be due after such time as the plaintiffs might see fit to make the application of prior payments for the use, wear, and tear of the property. Here they had a contract that might have been enforced five months before, and applied the payment on the wear and tear and use of the property. They saw fit to let it run five months, and then, when they took the property, that application is made. 'Up to the time of the retaking' is the language of the contract. Then, by the very terms of the contract, the money paid prior to the retaking went to the plaintiffs as compensation for the use, wear, and tear of the property. They selected the time of taking it. They might have taken it earlier, and the fact that they took it so much later I think is conclusive that they deemed that the prior payments were adequate for the use, wear, and tear of the property up to that time, and that the property at that time was of sufficient value to pay the balance of the claim." The case is brought here by writ of error.

Some controversy arose about the question of estoppel because of a payment of $60 claimed to have been made by defendants, after the letter of July 9, 1895. That payment resulted from a garnishee process. The circuit judge was of the opinion that it was not a voluntary payment by defendants, and did not affect the other questions in the case. We think he was right, and shall not discuss that feature of the case further.

It is the contention of the plaintiff that, notwithstanding he has received back the machinery after it had been used about sixty days, which was billed at $2,600, and has received a payment of $800, he is still entitled to a judgment for the face of the notes and interest, and he urges this would not be unjust, because the parties have so agreed, and they must be presumed to know the effect of their agreement; and it is also said "that the proper construction of the contract is that, under such circumstances, plaintiff cannot lawfully retain the property on being tendered his money, and that, therefore, the mere retaking of the property cannot be treated (as was done by the trial court) as an application of all prior payments towards the use, wear, and tear, etc., of the machinery, and as an election of remedies so as to prevent his maintaining an action on the notes." This was not the construction put upon the contract by the plaintiff when he credited the defendants with the inventory price of the machinery taken back, less 50 per cent for depreciation, and wrote them July 9, 1895: "We also hand you herewith a statement of your account with us to date, after crediting you with the machinery received, as per inclosed credit memorandum. We ask you what is your pleasure in regard to the settlement for balance due? Owing to the ill treatment we have received at your hands in regard to the settlement of your account with us, we do not feel that you are entitled to any extended courtesies in regard to the payment of this balance." There was nothing in this letter indicating that plaintiff recognized any obligation to return the property upon a tender of the amount due upon the notes, or that he was holding it for the purpose of enforcing the lien he had upon it for the amount of his debt. Does the law give the contract any such construction as is now claimed by counsel? Counsel do not call our attention to any cases directly in point, but cite Hays v. Jordan, 85 Ga. 741, 9 L. R. A. 378; Preston v. Whitney, 23 Mich. 262; Johnston v. Whittemore, 27 Mich. 468; New Home Sewing Mach. Co. v. Bothane, 70 Mich. 448; Thirby v. Rainbow, 93 Mich. 164; White v. Solomon, 164 Mass. 516, 80 L. R. A. 587; and other cases,—claiming that the reasoning employed by the court tends to support their contention. So far as these cases are in point at all, we think they are against the position of the plaintiff. In the last-named case, Chief Justice Field wrote an opinion, which was joined in by two of the other judges, in which he said: "The contract, I think, is in effect a contract for a conditional sale, and the intention is that the title shall not vest in the defendant until the price is paid. If the price is not paid according to the terms of the contract, the plaintiffs are authorized to retake the manikin without being accountable to the defendant for any of the money paid by him on account of the price. If the plaintiffs exercise this right of retaking the manikin into their possession because the price is not paid, they have both the title and the possession, because they have never parted with the title. What, then, is the rule of damages under such a conditional contract of sale, when the vendee refuses to receive the article, and it is returned to and retained by the vendor? I think that the construction to be given to the contract is that, if the defendant does not pay the price according to the contract, the plaintiffs may retake the manikin from the possession of the defendant and retain what he has paid on account of the price, or they may leave the manikin in the possession of the defendant and sue him for the instalments of the price which remain unpaid, but the plaintiffs cannot collect the whole price and also retake the manikin; they cannot hold the title to the property and also recover the price of it." It is not agreed in the contract that, if the property is retaken, and the payments made up to that time are treated as payments for the use, wear, and tear of the said property, that the vendor may also sue for the amount due on the notes. After the vendor has taken possession of the property, the contract does not give the vendees any further interest in it. The character of the contract, and the results which may be worked out under it, are not such as to make it desirable to read into it provisions it does not contain. The contract provides for two ways of enforcing it. The plaintiff might sue on the note, and retain the property until the judgment was paid, or might retake the property, and treat the payments up to that time made as payments for the use, wear, and tear of the machinery, but he cannot do both. The plaintiff has taken possession of the property as the owner thereof. What have the defendants had as the consideration of the note? They acquired no title or interest in the property, and could not until they paid the notes. They could not call the plaintiff to account for a disposition of the property, if he has made any, because they had no interest whatever in it, having made default in the payment of the notes, the vendor having exercised his right, under the contract, to take possession. The defendants have simply had for the notes the use of the property, and for that use they have paid the $800, which the contract gives the vendor the right to so apply. The vendor is not entitled to the title and possession of the property, and to be paid for it also. Seanon v. McLaughlin, 165 Pa. 150, 32 L. R. A. 467; Bailey v. Hervey, 135 Mass. 172; *Earle v. John C. O'KEEFE, Resp't.,

v.

LIVERPOOL & LONDON & GLOBE INSURANCE COMPANY, Appl.

(140 Mo. 558.)

A building that has lost its identity and specific character as a building and become so far disintegrated that it cannot be properly designated as a building, although some part of it may remain standing and the lower floors are in such condition that they could be safely used for rebuilding, is a total loss within the meaning of Rev. Stat. 1890, § 5897, requiring full payment of insurance in case of total loss.

(July 6, 1897.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of a fire-insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Fyke, Yates, & Fyke, for appellant:

The evidence is uncontradicted that defendant demanded of plaintiff that he furnish to defendant, in accordance with the plain terms of the contract, verified plans and specifications of the property damaged, and that plaintiff refused so to do. This requirement of the contract is reasonable, valid, and binding.

Arnold v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 55 Mo. App. 149; Fawcett v. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co. 27 U. C. Q. B. 225.

The property insured was not a total loss. Such being the case it was at plaintiff's option under § 5899, Rev. Stat., to have the property repaired to the extent of such damage, or to have defendant pay him a sum of money equal to the damage done to the property.

The property not having been totally lost, and a difference having arisen between plaintiff and defendant as to the amount of damage, the defendant had the right under the plain terms of the contract to have the amount of damage fixed by appraisers.

The instruction that "by a total loss it meant that the building has lost its identity and specific character as a building, and become so far disintegrated that it cannot be properly designated as a building, although some part of it may remain standing," is misleading, and is not a proper definition of the term "total loss."

The property insured was "his two-story and foundation brick, gravel-roof building, etc." The foundation was a part of the property insured, and formed an integral part of it, necessary to its construction.

Truedell v. Gray, 18 Gray, 318; 1 Bouvier, Law Dict. p. 195.

Messrs. Wallace & Wallace for respondent.

Grant, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action upon a policy of insurance issued by the defendant to the plaintiff on the 15th day of May, 1894, insuring plaintiff for one year against loss or damage by fire, to an amount not exceeding $3,000, to his two story and foundation brick, gravel-roof building, with its additions, porches, steam, gas, and water pipes, plumbers' work and fixtures, steam-heating apparatus and connections and piping, stone and prismatic sidewalks adjoining, plate glass, skylights, and all permanent improvements therein. The policy contained this provision: "This company shall not be liable beyond the actual cash value of the property at the time any loss or damage occurs, and the loss or damage shall be ascertained or estimated according to such actual cash value, with proper deductions for depreciation, however caused, and shall in no event exceed what it would then cost the insured to repair or replace the same with material of like kind and quality. Said ascertainment shall be made by the insured and this company, or, if they differ, then by appraisers, as hereinafter provided. It shall be optional, however, with this company . . . to repair, rebuild, or replace the property lost or damaged with other of like kind and quality within a reasonable time on giving notice . . . of its intention so to do. If fire occurs, the insured shall furnish, if required, verified plans and specifications of any building destroyed or damaged. In the event of disagreement as to the amount of loss, the same shall, as above provided, be ascertained by two competent and disinterested appraisers, the insured and this company each selecting one, and the two so chosen shall first select a competent and disinterested umpire. The appraisers together shall then estimate and appraise the loss, and, failing to agree, shall submit their differences to the umpire; and the award, in writing, of any two shall determine the amount of such loss. The loss shall not become payable until after the notice, ascertainment, estimate, and satisfactory proof of the loss herein required have been received by this company, including an award by appraisers when appraisement has been required. No suit or action on this policy shall be sustainable until after full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements." On June 8, 1894, a fire occurred, by which plaintiff claimed the building was wholly destroyed, in contemplation of the statute of this state, and defendant claimed that there was only a partial loss, and demanded an arbitration. The great burden of the testimony was to the effect that the front, which consisted of iron pillars and brick superstructure, was rendered useless in the condition in which it was left. The pillars were warped, and the wall above them sprung out of plumb. The side walls of the lower story were so badly burned that the architects and carpenters testified that the building could not be repaired; that the old walls would have to be taken down, and the building rebuilt from the foundation up. It appeared, however, that a portion of one of the walls in the second story was not ruined by the fire, and the effort of defendant was to show that this wall could be shored up, and the burnt portion in the first story taken out and rebuilt; but the architects and builders testified that this would be much more costly than taking down the whole of the walls, and building them anew, and, even if done, would not be as good as it was before the fire. The joists were burnt, and the roof and window sills destroyed. The main contention is based upon the evidence that, so far as the witnesses could see, the foundation was not hurt much, if any. Two builders testified for defendant as to their estimates for rebuilding the house. One, Mr. Kelly, testified it could be repaired and replaced for $1,738.45; the other, Mr. Huckle, estimated it at $1,688.50; but neither testified it could be done without taking down all the old walls. Plaintiff offered testimony of builders, also, who estimated the loss, one at $3,419.50, the other at $3,752. The other defense set up in the defendant's answer—the failure of the plaintiff to furnish the defendant with plans and specifications of the building—grows out of the correspondence between the parties. The company wrote Mr. O'Keefe, under date of June 12, demanding an adjustment of the damages by appraisers. Mr. O'Keefe answered this under date of June 14, informing the company that there had been a total destruction of the building as such, and demanding the face of the policy. On July 27, Mr. O'Keefe furnished the company with proofs of loss, which were duly received, and not objected to. On August 13, the company wrote Mr. O'Keefe, acknowledging receipt of the proofs, giving notice that they were willing to repair the building or adjust the damages by appraisers. And on August 20, the company again wrote Mr. O'Keefe, as follows:

John C. O'Keefe, Esq.—

Dear Sir:

We hereby give you notice that we will repair the building, No. 1521 West Ninth street, Kansas City, Mo., insured under our policy 13,928, Kansas City, Mo., agency, and in this way make good the damage which occurred on the 3d day of June, 1894. You are hereby requested to furnish us with verified plans and specifications of this building for the purpose aforesaid.

This letter was replied to by the counsel for Mr. O'Keefe, informing the company that, if they would rebuild from the ground up, they could do so, but that the proposition to repair was impracticable, as no part of the old walls could be used, and their use had been forbidden by the city authorities.

1. The merits of this appeal hinge upon whether this was "a total loss" by fire, within 39 L. R. A.

the meaning of § 5897, Rev. Stat. 1889, or "a partial loss" only, and therefore falling within the provisions of § 5899, Rev. Stat. 1889. To ascertain the fact, the court directed the jury as follows: "By a total loss is meant that the building has lost its identity and specific character as a building and become so far disintegrated that it cannot be properly designated as a building, although some part of it may remain standing." If this is a correct instruction on the law of the case, the finding of the jury must conclude the defendant. In Havens v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 123 Mo. 408, 26 L. R. A. 107, the court in banc defined "a total loss," within the meaning of a similar section, when applied to a building, to mean "totally [or wholly] destroyed as a building, although there is not an absolute extinction of all its parts. It matters not that some debris remains which may be useful or valuable for some purposes." Over thirty years ago, this court, in Nave v. Home Mut. Ins. Co. 37 Mo. 430, 90 Am. Dec. 394, held that a policy of insurance upon a building is an insurance upon the building as such, and not upon the material of which it was composed. In Lindner v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 98 Wis. 526, it was ruled by the supreme court of Wisconsin that, where the identity of a building as such has been destroyed by fire, it is a total loss, though some of its materials may not have been entirely destroyed. In that case it appeared from the evidence of the adjuster that the foundation and cellar of the house were entire, and a portion of the sills stood upon the stone work, and it was argued that, because the foundation was intact and had not been broken into a shapeless mass, it was not "a total loss." But the court said this evidence would not prevent the case from being regarded as one of total loss. "It would not be expected that the foundation and cellar would be utterly destroyed." The court quoted with approval the language used in Seyk v. Millers' Nat. Ins. Co. 74 Wis. 72, 3 L. R. A. 523, that "it cannot be doubted that the identity and specific character of the insured buildings were destroyed by the fire, although there was not an absolute extinction of all the parts thereof. This was entire destruction of the buildings, within the meaning of the statute." So clear, indeed, did it seem to the court, that it held that the circuit court might have properly given a peremptory instruction that it was a total loss. To the same effect are the following decisions: Oshkosh Pkg. & Provision Co. v. Mercantile Ins. Co. 81 Fed. Rep. 200; German Ins. Co. v. Eddy, 38 Neb. 461, 19 L. R. A. 707; Insurance Co. of N. A. v. Baehler, 44 Neb. 549; Hamburg-Bremen F. Ins. Co. v. Garlington, 66 Tex. 108, 59 Am. Rep. 613; Huck v. Globe Ins. Co. 127 Mass. 806, 84 Am. Rep. 873; Williams v. Hartford Ins. Co. 54 Cal. 450. In Corbett v. Spring Garden Ins. Co. 85 Hun, 250, the court said: "There was sufficient to go to the jury upon the question whether the building had 'lost its identity and specific character as a building.' If it had, then there was a total destruction within the meaning and intent of the parties and the policy." See also Royal Ins. Co. v. McIntyre (Tex. Civ. App.) 34 S. W. 669. We hold the instruction was proper, and that the court committed no error in refusing to instruct for defendant that if the cellar walls remained, and the lower floors were in such condition that they could be safely used in rebuilding, the building was not wholly destroyed. The escape of the stones in the foundation walls from complete extinction, if such a thing be possible, did not prevent the destruction of the building, as such, being total.

2. It follows as a necessary corollary that as the jury found there was a total loss, and the right to an arbitration was only stipulated for in case of a partial loss, there was nothing to arbitrate. An agreement to arbitrate in case of a total loss is repugnant to our statute and void. Daggs v. Orient Ins. Co. 136 Mo. 882, 85 L. R. A. 227; Havens v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 128 Mo. 403, 26 L. R. A. 107. Clearly, an appraisement of property wholly destroyed would be an anomaly.

As to the remaining points, they seem to be without merit. The proofs were duly made out, and no objections were made to their sufficiency. The whole case depended upon the claim of plaintiff that the loss was total. If he was right, there was nothing to appraise, nothing to arbitrate. Under proper instructions, the jury sustained his claim, and their verdict concludes the fact.

The judgment is affirmed.

for appellant in a criminal case will not require the dismissal of the appeal when the delay was

As to the rights of persons charged with felony to appear in person, and with counsel, to be present at the trial and be confronted with witnesses, see note to Gore v. State (Ark.) 5 L. R. A. 832, and briefs in Parker v. People (Colo.) 4 L. R. A. 803; French v. State (Wis.) 21 L. R. A. 402.

The decision in the principal case, STATE v. WILLIAMS, is in keeping with the general rule established by the prior cases to the effect that manacles must not be placed upon a prisoner when on trial, unless it is necessary so to do in order to secure him or to prevent harm in cases where he is not to be trusted.

I. In general.

In the Mirror of Justice, lib. 5, chap. 5, § 4, it is said that it is an abuse that a prisoner should be loaded with irons or put in chains before he is attainted with felony. It does not, however, appear whether the time of actual trial is meant.

So in Xen. Hell. lib. 1, chap. 7, § 20, it would appear that the decree of Canons was peremptory, and ordained that anyone who wronged the Athenian people should be put in chains and defend himself in the general assembly.

It has ever been the rule at common law that a prisoner brought into the presence of a court for trial upon his plea of not guilty to an indictment for any offense is entitled to appear free of all manner of shackles or bonds. People v. Harrington, 42 Cal. 165, 166, 10 Am. Rep. 296.

In 3 Coke's Institutes, p. 34, it is said, if felons come to judgment to answer, etc., they shall be out of irons and all manner of bonds, so that their pain shall not take away any manner of reason nor them constrain to answer, but at their free will. And in another place the same author says, and of prisoners we will that none shall be put in irons, but those which shall be taken for felony or trespass in parks or vivaries, or which be found in arerages upon account, and we defend that otherwise they shall not be punished nor tormented. Of this omnes autem attachabiles licet vicecomiti in prisona custodire etc., non tamen ad puniend, sed ad custodiend, etc. It is an abuse that prisoners be charged with irons, or put to any pain before they are attainted, and there is no difference in law, as to a priest and a layman, as to irons. So, where the law requires that a prisoner shall be kept in salva et arcta custodia, yet that must be without pain or torment to the prisoner.

2. The ancient right of one accused of crime under an indictment or information to appear in court unfettered is preserved by legislative adoption of the common law.

son nor them constrain to answer, but at their free will. And in another place the same author says, and of prisoners we will that none shall be put in irons, but those which shall be taken for felony or trespass in parks or vivaries, or which be found in arerages upon account, and we defend that otherwise they shall not be punished nor tormented. Of this omnes autem attachabiles licet vicecomiti in prisona custodire etc., non tamen ad puniend, sed ad custodiend, etc. It is an abuse that prisoners be charged with irons, or put to any pain before they are attainted, and there is no difference in law, as to a priest and a layman, as to irons. So, where the law requires that a prisoner shall be kept in salva et arcta custodia, yet that must be without pain or torment to the prisoner.

And in 2 Hale, P. C. 212, it is said that the prisoner, though under indictment of the highest crime, must be brought to the bar without irons and all manner of shackles or bonds, unless there be danger of escape, and then they may be brought with irons, although the author notes that at that day they usually came with their shackles on their legs for fear of an escape, but stood at the bar unbound until they received judgment.

In a note to the foregoing it is said, it appears to have been one author's opinion, that upon whatever occasion a prisoner be brought into court, he ought not to stand there in vinculis till after his conviction, when he comes to receive judgment, not even at the time of his arraignment (for that is the time our author is here discoursing of), yet in Layer's Case, 16 How. St. Tr. 94, a difference was taken at the time of arraignment and the time of trial; and accordingly the prisoner in that case stood at the bar in chains during his arraignment.

At the present day the doctrine would seem to be well established that the practice of shackling prisoners should never be resorted to except in cases where the circumstances show some real danger of escape, or perhaps of rescue. Faire v. State, 58 Ala. 74.

3. The constitutional right of an accused person to appear and defend in person includes the right to be unfettered unless some impelling necessity demands his restraint to secure the safety of others and his own custody.

4. The rights of an accused person to a fair trial are impaired by keeping manacles on other persons who are kept in court and in the presence of the jury when they have been found guilty of the crime of burglary with which he also is charged.

(October 22, 1897.)

In State v. Kring, 64 Mo. 591, Affirming 1 Mo. App. 438, it is said that without some good reason authorizing the criminal court to depart from the general practice in England and in the United States the shackles of the prisoner when brought before the jury for trial should be removed.

And the language of the court in Rainey v. State, 20 Tex. App. 455, 472, is identically the same.

So, in Faire v. State, 58 Ala. 74, 80, the court says that to shackle prisoners without cause is a revolting practice, and that it should be an extreme case to justify shackles or manacles on a prisoner undergoing trial.

The rule would seem to be based upon the reason that the condition of a prisoner in shackles may, to some extent, deprive him of the free and calm use of all his faculties. State v. Kring, 64 Mo. 591, Affirming 1 Mo. App. 438.

Any order or action of the court, which, without evident necessity, imposes physical burdens, pains, and restraints upon a prisoner during the progress of his trial, inevitably tends to confuse and embarrass his mental faculties, and thereby materially to abridge and prejudicially affect his constitutional rights of defense; and especially would such physical bonds and restraints in like manner materially impair and prejudicially affect his statutory privilege of becoming a competent witness and testifying in his own behalf. People v. Harrington, 42 Cal. 185, 186, 10 Am. Rep. 296.

In Lee v. State, 51 Miss. 566, 574, it is stated that a strong reason for the rule might be found in the knowledge that, under some circumstances, shackles and bonds are degrading and pernicious in their effect upon the wearer, and, in the minds of others, but tend to contempt and prejudice; while, under other circumstances, they would create sympathy and favor, and that a trial might occur, wherein the shackles of the accused would have no influence on the minds of the jury or the public.

When the court allows a prisoner to be brought before the jury with his hands chained in irons, and refuses, on his application or that of his counsel, to order their removal, the jury must necessarily conceive a prejudice against the accused as being, in the opinion of the judge, a dangerous man and one not to be trusted, even under the surveillance of officers. State v. Kring, 64 Mo. 591, Affirming 1 Mo. App. 438.

Again, it has been said that it is irregular to compel the prisoner to appear at the bar in irons upon the trial of his cause, for no better reason than that it would be inconvenient to remove them, or that their removal would cause a delay of a few hours in the trial. Territory v. Kelly, 2 N. M. 297, 302.

And the mere fact that it will take time and require the work of a blacksmith to remove them is no excuse. State v. Smith, 11 Or. 205, 207.

So in Cranburne's Case, in the year 1698, 5 How. St. Tr. 979, note, the prisoner, who had been previously arraigned, was brought to the bar in irons, and Chief Justice Holt ordered his irons to be removed upon the ground that the prisoner ought to stand and plead at ease when tried, but, it appears L. R. A.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Whitman County convicting him of burglary. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John F. Dillon for appellant.

Mr. John W. Mathews for the State.

Reavis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was convicted in the superior court of Whitman county of the crime of burglary. The prosecuting attorney appears pleading that there were no instruments in court with which the irons could be removed, the prisoner remained shackled until the court adjourned when the irons were required to be knocked off.

In the Trial of Lilburne, 4 How. St. Tr. 1308, the prisoner objected to the irons which had been placed upon his hands, and claimed that by the laws of England no prisoner for any crime whatsoever, who behaved himself civilly and peaceably in his imprisonment, ought to be put in irons or to any other pain or torment before he was legally convicted. The court ordered him to be released from his irons and from close imprisonment.

So, in the Trial of Twenty-nine Regicides, 5 How. St. Tr. 979, it was held that, when the prisoners came to the bar to be tried, their irons ought to be taken off, so that they be not put in any torture while they make their defense, be their crime never so great, and the court therefore ordered their irons to be removed.

Again, in Vaughan's Case, decided in 1693, 5 How. St. Tr. 980, note, when the prisoner who had been previously arraigned was brought to the bar his irons were ordered to be taken off.

And in Fletcher's Case, decided in the year 1746, 5 How. St. Tr. 981, note, the prisoner desired that his fetters might be taken off while he was on his trial, which desire the court granted.

In Layer's Case, 16 How. St. Tr. 94, in answer to a complaint on behalf of the prisoner, it is said: "As to the chains you complain of, it must be left to those to whom the custody of you is committed by law to take care that you may not make your escape; when you come to your trial then your chains may be taken off."

II. When justifiable.

In Faire v. State, 58 Ala. 74, it is said that it is the duty of the sheriff to keep the prisoner in safe custody that he may abide the judgment of the law; and his watchfulness, sanctioned and controlled by the court, will rarely err in the exercise of such power.

So, there is no absolute unbending rule that a prisoner on trial for crime shall in no case be fettered. Faire v. State, 58 Ala. 74, 80.

In Faire v. State, 58 Ala. 74, the court confessed that, inasmuch as there are cases in which it is permissible to try prisoners with shackles on them, it was unable to lay down any rule for the guidance of the primary courts, except to leave the question to their sound and enlightened discretion, although it is stated that no prisoner, while undergoing trial, shall be exposed to the discomfort or mortification of any description of shackles or bonds, unless his conduct in prison, or other satisfactory evidence, created a reasonable belief that such restraint is necessary to prevent his escape, or perhaps to prevent a rescue if surrounding circumstances give sufficient evidence of the danger.

There must, however, be some necessity for the shackles. State v. Smith, 11 Or. 205, 207.

In passing upon the right of a prisoner to appear unmanacled at his trial, the court, in Faire v. State, 58 Ala. 74, 80, said that, even in People v. Harrington, on behalf of the state, and moves to dismiss the appeal because appellant's brief was not filed in due time. It appears that the time within which appellant's brief ought to have been filed expired on the 2d day of June, 1897, and that the brief was not filed until the 23d day of the same month. But the counsel who appeared for the defendant at the trial had removed from the state before the brief was filed. The defendant was at the time confined in jail, and, so soon as he learned that the brief was not filed within the proper time, procured it to be filed. The question not being one of the jurisdiction of the appeal, the appellant's excuse for failure to file his brief within the proper time is deemed sufficient, and the motion to dismiss denied.

The first error assigned by appellant is the refusal of the court to grant a continuance on appellant's application because of the absence of a material witness for appellant. The affidavit, while rather general in its statement of the acts, seems to be sufficient to have entitled appellant to further time. But, as this ton, 42 Cal. 165, 10 Am. Rep. 296, the language of the court forbids the construction that it would under all circumstances be error to proceed with the trial of the prisoner without removing his shackles, and also that some importance should be attached to the fact that in that case the decision of the court that the prisoner was entitled to appear for trial "free from all manner of shackles or bonds" was qualified by the emphatic language, "unless there is danger of his escape."

The rule applies to prisoners under indictment of the highest crime, unless there is danger of escape, and then they may be brought with irons. Faire v. State, 58 Ala. 74, 80, citing 2 Hale, P. C. p. 219; 4 Bl. Com. 322; Lee v. State, 51 Miss. 566, 574; Matthews v. State, 9 Lea, 128, 130, 42 Am. Rep. 687.

In Faire v. State, 58 Ala. 74, wherein the prisoner remained shackled for fear of an escape, and to prevent his carrying out certain threats, the court drew a distinction between that case and the practice as stated by Lord Chief Justice Holt, upon the ground that the remarks made by him were made on the trial of a case which was marked by no facts or circumstances rendering it necessary that the prisoner should be shackled, and were intended to express more a rule of judicial propriety than of municipal law, the justice then dealing with the custom which had become common and oppressive, and not with a case whose circumstances showed the necessity of bonds to prevent escape.

So, if the court is of the opinion that the retention of irons upon the limbs of the prisoner is a reasonable precaution to prevent an escape, or to insure the safety of the bystanders, and the orderly conduct of the prisoner, he may remain shackled. Territory v. Kelly 2 N. M. 297, 302.

And the court has power, at the commencement or during the progress of the trial, to make such orders as may be necessary to secure a quiet and safe one, but there must be some reason, based on the conduct of the prisoner at the time of the trial, to authorize so important a right to be forfeited. State v. Kring, 64 Mo. 591, Affirming 1 Mo. App. 438.

Again, in Rex v. Rogers, 3 Burr. 1812, the prisoners had broken open the jail after having murdered the jailer, and had become a terror to the neighborhood, and from a memorandum to the case it appears that they remained chained together during the whole proceeding.

Where it appeared from representations made by the sheriff, not under oath and inaudible to anyone save the court, and in a voice not to be heard either by the jury, the defendant, or his counsel, that the prisoner had told the sheriff that he would rather die than be hung or sent to the penitentiary, and that if the jury found him guilty he would not come out of the court-house alive, as he would escape or the officer would have to shoot him, and that from the character of the prisoner, and his conduct, the sheriff entertained serious apprehensions that he would attempt an escape and create a scene in the court room, if not secured, after the first day of the trial, clasps, connected by a chain 18 inches long by 1 1/2 inches in diameter, were placed on his ankles by order of the court directing the necessary precautions to be taken, but not in the presence of the jury, and made as little apparent as possible, and that irons should not be put on his hands. The court stated that the judge and sheriff were sworn officers, and there did not seem to be a violation of the usages of the court, or of any right of the prisoner, for the court, in incidental matters connected with the conduct of its business, to act on the statement of its executive officer without requiring him to take the oath as to the truth of his representations, and that to require a public disclosure and trial of the facts, as a preliminary to the placing of irons on prisoners when on trial, would be much more likely to create prejudice against the prisoner than quietly to order the same, as was done in that case. Faire v. State, 58 Ala. 74.

In State v. Lewis, 19 Kan. 280, 283, 27 Am. Rep. 113, the defendant in custody, charged with burglary in the second degree, while awaiting trial, broke jail and escaped. He was subsequently arrested under a warrant issued by a justice of the peace and charged with breaking jail. He was taken before the justice for a preliminary examination without his handcuffs being removed, and waived a preliminary examination and was returned to jail. He was subsequently tried for burglary and acquitted, and later an information was laid against him, charging him with the breaking of jail and escaping, to which, upon arraignment, he pleaded, inter alia, that he was handcuffed and in the custody of the sheriff and policeman when he waived the preliminary examination, and that therefore such waiver was a nullity and the county attorney had no power to file such information. The court held that such plea was bad and sustained the demurrer thereto.

Where the proceedings had been temporarily suspended to allow the sheriff time to summon additional jurors, and to remove the prisoner to the dock in the rear of the court room and there handcuff him in order to prevent escape, and while there some of the jurors who had failed to answer upon the first call appeared and were passed upon by the prosecution and accepted by the prisoner's counsel before he had returned to his side, and there had been ample time for objection, all that occurred being within the view and hearing of the prisoner, and it was only intended that he should be fettered during the suspension of the proceedings in making up the jury, it was held that such proceeding was in conflict with the humane spirit of the law that required a prisoner to be unfettered during his trial, and therefore the verdict could not be reversed upon that ground. Matthews v. State, 9 Lea, 128, 131, 42 Am. Rep. 687.

So, in Poe v. State, 10 Lea. 673, 675, the prisoners, charged with murder in the first degree, were brought up for trial manacled together by the wrist, and after one witness had been examined, the prisoners' counsel moved for an order upon the sheriff to remove the manacles as being an unlawful restraint, prejudicial to their rights while on trial, but the trial judge declined to make the order upon the ground that the loose manner in which they were guarded required either the manquestion is not likely to arise upon a new trial, it is not necessary to further notice this objection than to observe that § 22, art. 1, of the state Constitution, guarantees to persons prosecuted for crime the right to have compulsory process to compel the attendance of witnesses in their behalf, and under this constitutional guaranty the accused has the right to compulsory process to procure the physical attendance of the witness at the trial.

It appears that during the trial the defendant was brought into court, and kept there, in ancles, or some other stringent orders to the guards which would be equally unpleasant to the prisoners, because one of the prisoners had been twice before the court on a similar charge, and had escaped from jail, and was therefore a fugitive from justice, while on another occasion he had escaped from his guard, although recaptured, and also for the reason that both prisoners while in jail had been furnished with arms of a dangerous character by unknown persons and with keys to unlock their handcuffs, and had also found means or implements by which to make their escape, the court regarding them as desperate men who, if unmanacled, could easily disarm the guard and effect their escape. This was held to be a matter within the discretion of the trial court, whose action could not be reversed unless it was shown that there was a clear case of abuse as to such discretion, the record in that case not showing any such abuse.

In Faire v. State, 58 Ala. 74, 98, there was a dissenting opinion by Chief Justice Brickell, in which he held that it was not a matter of discretion with the judge whether the prisoner should be brought to the bar or tried in fetters, although he admitted that there might possibly be a necessity for fettering a prisoner, and if such necessity was shown it might be the duty of the court to order it, and he deemed the action of the court reviewable, and thought the judgment of conviction should be reversed unless it clearly appeared that there was an immediate pressing necessity for the order.

Yet the mere fact that the prisoner had assaulted a person in court about three months before the term at which he was tried would not be sufficient to justify the court in assuming, on his trial for life, that he would be guilty of similar outrages, and thus order him to be shackled. State v. Kring, 64 Mo. 591, Affirming 1 Mo. App. 438.

In State v. Stalcup, 24 N. C. (2 Ired. L.) 50, the right of an officer arresting a prisoner under a state warrant to secure him by shackles was held justifiable, when, in the opinion of such officer, it was necessary so to do in order to secure his prisoner, but that case did not raise the question of the right to produce his prisoner on trial in such a condition. See Rainey v. State, 20 Tex. App. 455, 472, infra, IV.

III. Upon his arraignment and sentence.

In King v. Walte, 1 Leach, C. L. 28, 36, the prisoner was charged with a felony in the embezzlement of an East India bond committed to his care, and at the time of his arraignment desired that his irons might be taken off. The court informed him that it had no authority for that purpose until the jury were charged to try him, whereupon he pleaded not guilty, and being put upon trial his fetters were immediately knocked off.

So, in Laver's Case, 16 How. St. Tr. 94, it was urged by counsel that the prisoner's irons should be taken off before he pleaded. The court stated that there was no doubt that when the prisoner came up for his trial he was not to be in vinculis during his trial, but should be so far free that he should have the use of his reason and all advantages to clear his innocence, but that when he was only called upon to plead by advice of his counsel he was not to be then tried, and that when he came up for trial if he made complaint the court would take care that he should be in a condition proper to make his defense, the court making the distinction between arraigning the prisoner to plead and his trial.

In that case also the court drew a distinction between the case of a prisoner on trial, and one subsequently brought before the court for sentence after trial, the court stating that none of the cases went any further than during the time of his trial, although, in that case, it was stated that if he had anything to say and thought he might not be able to do it so well while he was under irons the court would recommend it to the attorney general not to make a precedent of it that his irons might be taken off.

But even upon his arraignment it is held in American cases that unless there is danger of escape, he should not be brought in irons. Faire v. State, 58 Ala. 74, 80, citing 1 Bushop, Crim. Proc. § 731; People v. Harrington, 42 Cal. 165, 166, 10 Am. Rep. 296. See also State v. Lewis, 19 Kan. 280, 263, 27 Am. Rep. 113, supra, II.

IV. As a ground of reversal and review.

The rule would seem to be that, when the record affirmatively discloses the fact that there is no reason whatever for placing shackles or manacles upon the prisoner, against his protest, while undergoing trial, a question of law arises which may be reviewed on appeal, and the judgment reversed. Territory v. Kelly, 2 N. M. 297, 302.

Yet the fact that the court or sheriff deemed it necessary to shackle a prisoner in order to prevent his escape during trial is no ground for reversal. Lee v. State, 51 Miss. 568, 574.

When, however, the record discloses some valid or reasonable ground of apprehension that the prisoner may attempt to escape or injure the bystanders or the officers in charge, or will be otherwise disorderly or dangerous, it shall be left entirely to the discretion of the trial court to determine whether the prisoner should be ironed or not, and when the record is silent as to whether there is or is not any valid excuse for retaining the irons upon the prisoner during the trial, the appellate court will presume that the court below exercised a sound and reasonable discretion in refusing to order the irons to be removed. Territory v. Kelly, 2 N. M. 297, 305.

In State v. Smith, 114 Mo. 406, 423, one of the grounds for a new trial was that the defendant was allowed to remain in shackles after the trial had begun. It was held that such a statement could not be supported by ex parte affidavits, and that the only way in which matters occurring in the presence of the court could be preserved was by incorporating them in the bill of exceptions.

It has been said that the accused has a right to be present during the trial and at the return of the verdict, and that when deprived of these privileges by being imprisoned in a jail or in any other improper manner the verdict returned against him should not be followed by a judgment or sentence of the court, but a new trial should be ordered if requested. Rose v. State, 20 Ohio, 83. In this case, however, it did not appear that the prisoner was manacled or shackled upon the first trial, and the case is therefore here cited only as an authority for showing that he must not be deprived of his privileges by being imprisoned in jail or "in any other improper manner," as the shackles placed upon the prisoner may be held to be an imprisonment as depriving him of his personal liberty; upon which see People v. Harrington, infra.

In People v. Harrington, 42 Cal. 165, 166, 10 Am. Rep. 296, the prisoner, indicted, tried, and convicted of the crime of robbery, appeared in shackmanacles, until, upon protest of defendant's counsel, the manacles were finally removed, but after a considerable period of time had elapsed, and further, that during the progress of the trial, and when it was very dark out of doors, at the state's request a view of the premises which were alleged to have been entered burglariously by the defendant was ordered by the court, and that, in the presence of the jury, manacles were placed upon the de-les, but as there was no pretense of necessity for the manacles and chains during his trial to secure his presence to answer the judgment, the court held there was error and that his legal rights were materially prejudiced, and therefore reversed the judgment and remanded the case for a new trial.

In State v. Smith, 11 Or. 205, 207, the defendant had been convicted and sentenced for an assault with a deadly weapon and wounding an officer of the penitentiary having the charge and custody of the prisoner, and the fact that the prisoner was kept with irons on his feet during the trial, and that the court refused a motion made by his counsel to have them removed, upon the ground that they were put on at the penitentiary and could not be removed without much delay and it would require the work of a blacksmith to remove them, was assigned as error. The court stated that the case of State v. Kring, 1 Mo. App. 438, 84 Mo. 591, left nothing further to be said upon the question, and that the point was ruled the same way in People v. Harrington, 42 Cal. 165, 10 Am. Rep. 296, and reversed the judgment, such keeping of the prisoner in irons being a violation of the common law, no evident necessity appearing for such keeping.

So, in People v. Harrington, 42 Cal. 165, 10 Am. Rep. 296, it was contended, on behalf of the prisoner, that the action of the court in refusing to direct the manacles to be removed from his limbs while he was in court upon his trial, and in compelling him to be tried while his limbs were shackled with irons, without any apparent or pretended necessity, deprived him of a substantial legal right, and that the judgment should be reversed. The court stated that there was no question but that any action of the court, during the progress of a trial for felony, which deprived the defendant of a substantial legal right in the premises, or which to any extent, to his prejudice, withholds or abridges a substantial legal or constitutional privilege of a defendant, which is claimed by him on the trial, was a proper subject for review by the court on appeal.

Where, however, the prisoner, indicted for murder, after the verdict was brought into open court, and when the motion for a new trial was disposed of, and the court was about to pass sentence, broke out into manifestations of violence and struggled with the officers to break away from them, and was attempting to commit acts of violence upon them, when they placed a pair of handcuffs on his wrists and he ceased his struggles, the court held that what was done was deemed necessary to protect the sheriff and bailiffs from violence, and for the preservation of order in court, and had no influence in the finding of the verdict or upon the sentence, and was therefore no ground for a reversal of the judgment. Upstone v. People, 109 Ill. 169, 179.

So, where the irons had not remained on the prisoner during his trial or for any considerable portion thereof, but only for an inconsiderable time while a few of the jurors were being called and examined, and before any of them had been accepted and sworn, it was held that the prisoner's rights of defense were not prejudicially affected thereby to an extent that would justify a reversal of the judgment on that ground. Territory v. Kelly, 2 N. M. 297, 306.

Again, in Rainey v. State, 20 Tex. App. 455, 472, the prisoner was brought into court for trial chained in a gang with several other prisoners, and the court instructed the sheriff to remove his chains after he had been seated within the bar, and his counsel took an exception to the action of the sheriff as illegal and calculated to prejudice him before the jury. The court regarded the sheriff's action as justifiable inasmuch as he deemed it unsafe to deal with the number of prisoners he had to bring out without chaining them together, and therefore affirmed the judgment of the court below, the chains being removed by the order of the court as soon as they were discovered.

As to when not a ground of reversal, see also supra, 11.; Mathews v. State, 9 Lea, 128, 131, 42 Am. Rep. 687; Poe v. State, 10 Lea, 573.

V. Provisions of state Constitutions and statutes.

In addition to the general provisions found in the declaration of rights of all the states of the Union relating to the rights of a prisoner upon his trial, the following special provisions and enactments are to be found in the Codes, statutes, and Constitutions of some states:

The Arizona Penal Code, Ariz. Rev. Stat. ed. 1887, § 1106, p. 758, provides that a person charged with a public offense shall not, before conviction, be subjected to any more restraint than is necessary for his detention to answer the charge.

A similar provision is contained in § 688, Cal. Code Crim. Proc. 4 Deering, Annotated Codes and Statutes, ed. 1886.

In People v. Harrington, 42 Cal. 165, 10 Am. Rep. 296, it was held that to require a prisoner during the progress of his trial by the court and jury to appear and remain with chains and shackles upon his limbs without evident necessity for such restraint for the purpose of securing his presence for judgment is a direct violation of the common-law rule and of the above section.

The Georgia Bill of Rights, art. 1, § 1, ¶ 9, Code. ed. 1895, vol. 2, § 5706, provides that no person shall be abused in being arrested, while under arrest, or imprisoned.

Idaho Rev. Stat. ed. 1887, p. 778, § 7357, provides, inter alia, that a person shall not be subjected before conviction to any more restraint than is necessary for his detention to answer the charge.

Indiana Const. art. 1, § 60 (1 Ind. Rev. Stat. 1896, Horner's Anno. ed.) provides that no person arrested or confined in jail shall be treated with unnecessary rigor.

Oklahoma Code Crim. Proc. § 21 (Stat. Okla. ed. 1893, § 4876, p. 980), provides that no person charged with a criminal offense shall be subject, before conviction, to any more restraint than is necessary for his detention to answer the charge.

Oregon Const. § 13, art. 1, provides that no person arrested or confined in jail shall be treated with unnecessary rigor.

R. I. Declaration of Rights, art. 1, of the Constitution, § 14, provides that, every man being presumed innocent until he is pronounced guilty by law, no act of severity which is not necessary to secure an accused person shall be permitted.

Tennessee Const. § 13, art. 1 (Declaration of Rights), provides that no person arrested and confined in jail shall be treated with unnecessary rigor.

And Utah Declaration of Rights, art. 1, § 9, provides, inter alia, persons arrested or imprisoned shall not be treated with unnecessary rigor.

A difference will be noticed in the wording of the section of the Tennessee Constitution and that of those of Oregon, Utah, and Indiana, inasmuch as in the former the words are "arrested and confined" while in the latter three the words are "arrested or confined."

fendant, and he was ordered by the court to go with the jury to the place of the alleged burglary, and while so manacled he went with the jury a distance of three or four blocks from the court-house, and returned to the court, when the trial proceeded, and defendant was permitted to remain manacled until, at his request, the court ordered the manacles removed. It also further appears from the record that one Bates and one Helen, who were jointly charged with the same crime as the defendant, had been theretofore tried in the court, and found guilty; that, at defendant's request, Bates was called to testify as a witness for defendant, and when Bates was brought into the court-room to testify, at the request of the prosecuting attorney, Helen was brought into court to remain in the presence of the jury during the time that Bates was testifying; that after Bates had given his testimony, he and Helen were manacled together in the presence of the court and jury; and that defendant protested against Bates and Helen being allowed to remain in the court-room, in the presence of the jury, manacled, and requested the court to order the manacles removed. The court refused the request. It was the ancient rule at common law that a prisoner brought into the presence of the court for trial upon a plea of not guilty to an indictment was entitled to appear free of all manner of shackles or bonds; and, prior to 1722, when a prisoner was arraigned or appeared at the bar of the court to plead, he was presented without manacles or bonds, unless there was evident danger of his escape. 2 Hale, P. C. 219; 4 Bl. Com. 322; Layser's Case, 16 How. St. Tr. 4th ed. by Hargrave, 230, 231, 244, 245; Waite's Case, 1 Leach, C. L. 86. In J. Kelyng's Reports (pleas of the crown adjudged in the reign of Charles II.): "It was resolved that, when prisoners come to the bar to be tried, their irons ought to be taken off, in that they be not in any torture while they make their defense, be their crime never so great. And accordingly, upon the arraignment and trial of Hewler and others, who were brought in irons, the court commanded their irons to be taken off." The common law of England was expressly adopted by legislative enactment at the first session of the legislative assembly of this territory, and there is no doubt that the ancient right of one accused of crime under an indictment or information to appear in court unfettered is still preserved in all its original vigor in this state. In State v. Kring, 64 Mo. 591, the prisoner was convicted of murder in the first degree. The plea of insanity was before the court, and the defendant had some three months before assaulted a person in open court. He was brought into the trial court manacled, and remained some time in that condition. The supreme court, in reversing the judgment of conviction, observed: "We have no doubt of the power of the criminal court, at the commencement, or during the progress of a trial, to make such orders as may be necessary to secure a quiet and safe one, but the facts stated by the court in this case, as shown by the record, that the prisoner had assaulted a person in court about three months before the term at which he was tried, would hardly authorize the court to assume that, on his trial for life, he would be guilty of similar outrages. There must be some reason based on the conduct of the prisoner at the time of the trial, to authorize so important a right to be forfeited. When the court allows a prisoner to be brought before a jury with his hands chained in irons, and refuses, on his application or that of his counsel, to order their removal, the jury must necessarily conceive a prejudice against the accused, as being in the opinion of the judge a dangerous man, and one not to be trusted, even under the surveillance of officers. Besides, the condition of the prisoner in shackles may, to some extent, deprive him of the free and calm use of all his faculties." Section 22, art. 1, of our Constitution, declares that "in criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right to appear and defend in person." The right here declared is to appear with the use of not only his mental but his physical faculties unfettered, and unless some impelling necessity demands the restraint of a prisoner, to secure the safety of others and his own custody, the binding of the prisoner in irons is a plain violation of the constitutional guaranty. When the witness Bates was manacled to Helen, and kept in court in the presence of the jury against the protest of defendant, defendant's right to a fair trial was impaired. It can hardly be conceived that there was any necessity for this incident to the trial. None appears in the record. 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 955; Whart. Pl. & Pr. § 540; *People v. cation for the issue of a policy of insurance will not be construed as warranties unless the provisions of the application and policy, taken together, leave no room for any other construction.

2. Whether an accident or a disease caused the death of a party, whose life was insured against death by accident, should be submitted to and determined by a jury, unless, with reference to that proposition, the proofs are so convincing that by them all reasonable men, in the fair exercise of their judgment, would be brought to adopt the same conclusions.

3. Where an accident insurance association introduced evidence of the statements of one of its members with reference to an accident which had happened to him some hours before the time of making such statements, it cannot complain because the same statements, made to other witnesses, were proved by the adverse party.

4. In an action for the recovery of the sum of $3,000 insurance on a certificate issued by a fraternal benefit association to one of its members, it cannot be permitted to urge that the said certificate limits the amount payable to the proceeds of an assessment of $2 on each member, and that there is therefore a question whether thereby $3,000 could be realized, in view of the fact that the statute to which such association owes its existence forbids it to issue a certificate of over $1,000 if it has not a membership of 2,000 in number.

5. The supreme court cannot assume that the rejection of written evidence was prejudicially erroneous when there is in the record before it no showing as to the nature of the evidence rejected.

ERROR to the District Court for Lancaster County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. A. R. Talbot, for plaintiff in error:

A certificate of membership in a mutual life insurance company provided that, on the death of the wife of the plaintiff, an assessment should be made upon the policy-holders in the company for as many dollars as there were policy holders, and that the sum collected, not exceeding $1,000, should be paid to him within ninety days from the filing of the proof of death. It was held that a declaration containing no allegation of a neglect to make the assessment provided for, and assigning no breach except of a promise to pay $1,000, was fatally defective, and that the defect was not cured by the verdict.

Curtis v. Mutual Ben. Life Co. 48 Conn. 98.

A petition which does not aver that the defendant failed or refused to lay any such assessment, or that, having laid one and collected it, he failed and refused to pay the same to the plaintiff, is demurrable.

Under a policy promising indemnity in case death results solely because of bodily injuries effected by external, violent, and accidental means, and independently of all other causes, the burden of proof is on those claiming under the policy to show that the accident was the sole cause of death, independently of all other causes.

Under such a policy, the insurer would not be liable if, at the time of the accident, insured was suffering from a pre-existing disease, and death would not have resulted from the accident in the absence of such a disease, but insured died because the accident aggravated the effects of the disease, or the disease the effects of the accident.

In a contract of insurance of this character, although the injury might revive a slumbering disease or bring into new activity a dormant disease, yet, unless the injury was sufficient of itself to produce death, the disease is considered the proximate cause, and the insurance company is not liable.

However severe an injury might be under this contract of insurance, if there was any disease or physical weakness which caused the death, although exaggerated and revived by said injury, it cannot be said that death was caused solely and independently by the injury and that a disease superinduced by the injury, cannot be a cause of death provided against in this contract of insurance.

Messrs. A. R. Talbot and T. S. Allen, for plaintiff in error, in support of petition for rehearing:

It is the duty of a court, in its relation to the jury, to protect parties from unjust verdicts arising from ignorance of the rules of law, and of evidence, from impulse of passion or prejudice, or from any other violation of his lawful rights in the conduct of a trial.

Messrs. J. H. Broady and A. N. Sullivan for defendant in error.

Ryan, C., filed the following opinion:

This action was brought in the district court of Lancaster county by Cella V. Shryock, to recover the amount of insurance existing in her favor by the terms of a certificate of membership, issued to her husband, whereby his life was insured against death by accident within ninety days. There was a verdict and judgment as prayed, and for the reversal of this judgment the association prosecutes these proceedings in error.

In the petition it was alleged that May 6, 1892, in consideration of $3 as a membership fee, paid by William B. Shryock for plaintiff, and of such future payments as might be required under defendant's articles of incorporation, the defendant had made and delivered to said William B. Shryock, its policy and certificate of insurance on the life of said William B. Shryock, in the sum of $3,000, and that plaintiff was the wife of William B. Shryock, and was the beneficiary in said policy. It was further averred that on or about July 2, 1892, while said policy was in full force, said William B. Shryock received a personal injury in the city of Omaha, from which injury, shortly thereafter, the death of said William B. Shryock resulted. It was further alleged that due proof of the death of William B. Shryock had been made, but that defendant nevertheless had refused to pay or make an assessment for the payment of the amount due plaintiff or any part thereof. There was a prayer for judgment in the sum of $3,000, with interest, which principal and interest equalled the sum for which the verdict was returned. The material portions of the answer were averments that William B. Shryock died of a disease not the result of any injury alleged to have been by him received; that there had been no compliance with the requirements of the policy as to proofs of injury; and that there had been no request for an assessment upon the members of defendant in good standing, under its rules, for the payment of the claim of plaintiff. It was further alleged that the defendant had never made an assessment upon its members for the payment of the claim set out in plaintiff's petition, and that defendant neither had nor would have in its possession any means wherewith to pay the same until such assessment should be levied and collected. There was in the answer the following language: "Further answering, the defendant alleges the fact to be that at the time of making the application for membership to the defendant, plaintiff's intestate, William B. Shryock, represented and warranted to the defendant, as a condition precedent, and as a basis upon which the policy sued on herein was issued, that he never had, nor was subject to, fits, disorders of the brain, or never had or was subject to any bodily or mental infirmity; that relying upon said statements, representations, and warranty that said William B. Shryock did not then, or never did, have any bodily or mental infirmity, the defendant issued and delivered to him the certificate or policy of insurance sued on herein; but the defendant avers that, at the time of making said application and tendering to the defendant said statements and representations and warranties as aforesaid, said William B. Shryock did then have bodily and mental infirmities which would tend to shorten life, and which, in fact, did produce the death complained of in plaintiff's petition, and that by reason thereof there was a breach of said warranties and conditions precedent which made void the policy issued and sued upon herein, and although said William B. Shryock at that time represented and warranted to the defendant that he did not have any bodily or mental infirmity, yet the defendant charges the fact to be that at that time said William B. Shryock did have fatty degeneration of the heart, or heart disease, which would tend to shorten life, and from which weakness and defect of the heart he, the said William B. Shryock, died." There was a reply in denial of each affirmative matter pleaded in the answer. On the trial there was submitted to the jury certain special interrogatories, which, with the answer to each, were, as follows:

(1) Did William B. Shryock, on or about the 2d day of July, 1892, meet with an accident in the city of Omaha, Nebraska, whereby he received external and violent bodily injury?

A. Yes.

(2) Did William B. Shryock, prior to and at the time of his death, have fatty degeneration of the heart?

A. Yes.

(3) If you answer that William B. Shryock received an accidental, external, and violent bodily injury, did that injury alone cause his death?

A. Yes.

(4) If you answer that William B. Shryock, prior to and at the time of his death, had fatty degeneration of the heart, did that disease alone cause his death?

A. No.

(5) What was the cause of the death of William B. Shryock?

A. By violent bodily injury, he at the time having fatty degeneration of the heart.

There was some conflict in the evidence, but, as the jury accepted as true that which tended to sustain the theory of plaintiff, it is unnecessary to consider any other in determining whether or not there was sufficient to sustain the special findings above quoted. James M. Robinson was a witness for the defendant in the district court, and testified that on July 1 or 2, 1892, he met William B. Shryock about half past 5 in the afternoon; and, by appointment, still later in the evening. The testimony of this witness in part was as follows:

Q. Now, did he say anything to you up to that time about slipping and hurting his leg?

A. Yes, sir; he told me several times that his foot had slipped, and he had hurt his knee.

Q. He told you several times during the two hours you were with him?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did you say he said about that?

A. He said his foot had slipped, and that he had wrenched his knee, and that it was hurting him.

Q. What knee was that?

A. I think it was the left knee. I am not sure, but it was the same knee he had hurt before.

Q. The same knee that was broken before?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did he say at that time about having recently removed the splints or bandages that the doctor had on the knee?

A. He said he had been wearing a bandage, or a brace, or something, and that he had taken it off lately, or something to that effect. I don't know how recently he had taken it off.

William Darst, a witness for the plaintiff, testified that he saw William B. Shryock at the store of witness in Omaha about 8 o'clock in the evening of July 1, 1892; that Shryock looked to witness like a man about to faint, was pale and trembling, and complained that he had hurt himself; that in coming up from the depot he had slipped and partially fallen; and that it pained him terribly right over his right hip. He kept his hand rubbing his side, and acted as if he was sick in his stomach. He was spitting as if he was sick in his stomach. He remained over two hours from the time he came in. Usually witness closed up at 9 o'clock at night, but his reason for not closing at that time, July 1, 1892, was given thus in his own language: "The condition he came in my store, and seeing that he was in pain, I stayed around an hour later than usual, thinking he would get better; and in fact he did get better. I wanted him to rest." This witness accompanied Mr. Shryock to the Murray Hotel. William Anderson, clerk at that hotel, testified that William B. Shryock came to the hotel about 10 o'clock of the night of July 1, 1892, and witness, upon shaking hands with him, noticed that Shryock's hand was very cold. Upon being asked about his health, Shryock said he was not feeling well, and asked if witness could spare a boy to go out and get some capsules. These were procured, as was also some whisky, and he went to his room. Frank Wigginton, the boy who procured the capsules, testified that they were quinine capsules, and that he showed Mr. Shryock to his room. In the afternoon of July 2, 1892, Mr. Shryock was found dead in his bed in the room to which he had been conducted by Wigginton. A post mortem examination was held, and the result of their investigations, as detailed by the doctors who conducted the same was to the following effect: Dr. Rebert said he found a contusion or abrasion over the right hip of Mr. Shryock; that his heart was large and dilated, filled with dark fluid,—blood. The contusion was of recent occurrence. There was nothing in the condition of the remains that would indicate that he would not have lived an indefinite time. The cause of his death was heart failure, induced by a shock and injury. The contusion indicated a fall, which might have caused the death of Mr. Shryock. The contusion was somewhat larger than the palm of a large hand. In relation to the opinion that Mr. Shryock might have lived an indefinite time, Dr. Rebert testified: "I mean by that, if no accident had occurred, no stage of sickness intervened, and in his ordinary, regular life, that in all probability his heart would have been capable of carrying on its functions for an indefinite length of time." Dr. Rebert further testified that while a fall, such as was indicated by the contusion to have taken place, would bring on heart failure, death might not follow before thirty-six hours. Dr. Lee testified that he took part in the post mortem examination described by Dr. Rebert and that there was found the abrasion or contusion described by Dr. Rebert. Dr. Lee also testified that they found an abrasion of the skin on the knee of Mr. Shryock, and that both the abrasion on the hip and that on the knee were of recent occurrence. He said that the death of Mr. Shryock was due to his getting injured, and not having sufficient vital capacity to recover from it; that, in the condition in which Mr. Shryock's heart was, it was possible for him to die the minute he sustained the injury, or he might have had sufficient vitality to live a few hours afterwards. On cross-examination Dr. Lee testified that the condition of Mr. Shryock was such that any shock or any blow would produce a shock which would so affect his heart that it would not have inherent strength enough to respond; consequently, a fainting would follow which he could not, and in this case did not, recover from. It seems to us that the special findings were in all respects supported by the testimony just quoted. There was no attempt to show that Mr. Shryock might not have been ignorant of any abnormal condition of that vital organ. There was, therefore, no fraudulent or wilful false representation as to the existence of such conditions as would have led to the rejection of the application for insurance, had their existence been known to the company.

In the membership certificate it was recited that it was issued in consideration of the warranties in the application, as well as in consideration of the payment of the premium. In his application, Mr. Shryock said: "I never had, nor am I subject to, fits, disorders of the brain, or any bodily infirmity." With reference to payment in case of death, the provision of the policy was as follows: "And the said association agreed to pay to Celia V. Shryock, wife, if living, . . . the sum of $3,000, if the death of the certificate holder shall result from such injuries alone within ninety days from the date of said accident." Upon these provisions the insurance company founds two arguments. One is that the representation as to the physical condition of Shryock was a warranty, broken when made, because of the existence of fatty degeneration of his heart. The other is that the death of the insured was not attributable solely to the accident which caused the one or more abrasions observed by the physicians. In respect to the alleged warranty the following language quoted from the syllabus in Kettenbach v. Omaha Life Assn. 49 Neb. 842, is applicable: "Statements contained in an application for a policy of insurance will not be construed as warranties unless the provisions of the application and policy, taken together, leave no room for any other construction. In construing a contract, for the purpose of determining whether the statements made therein were intended by the parties thereto to be warranties or representations, the court will take into consideration the situation of the parties, the subject-matter of the contract, and the language employed, and will consider a statement made to be a warranty only when it clearly appears that such was the intention of the contracting parties; that the mind of each party consciously intended and consented that such should be the interpretation of his statements." In line with these propositions it was held in the case just cited that, for representations to constitute a defense to an action on the policy, it is incumbent on the insurance company to prove the warranties were made as written in the application, that they were false in some particular material to the insurance risk, that they were made intentionally by the insured, that the insurance company relied and acted upon such statements; and these are questions of fact, and not questions of law. By its general verdict the jury settled this claim of warranty adversely to the contention of the insurance company, and its solution must control. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Melick, 27 U. S. App. 547, 65 Fed. Rep. 178, 12 C. C. A. 544, 27 L. R. A. 629.

In support of its argument that the accident was not the proximate cause of the death of Mr. Shryock, there has been cited National Masonic Acci. Assn. v. Shryock, 86 U. S. App. 658, 73 Fed. Rep. 774, 20 C. C. A. 8. The action in the case just referred to was on a policy in another company than plaintiff in error, but in all other respects there were involved the same circumstances as are presented by this case. In view of the extended consideration of cases rendered necessary by the holding of the circuit court of appeals of the eighth circuit of the United States, as formulated by Sanborn, J., in the case last referred to, we have purposely hitherto refrained from citations of authorities. Of this, the most important question involved in the case under consideration, we believe the cases hereinafter referred to in the discussion of the opinion delivered by Sanborn, J., will be found to furnish a very satisfactory solution. From this opinion we quote the following language: "The certificate of membership in this accident association, on which this action is based, contained the covenant of this corporation to pay to the defendant in error the indemnity it promised in case the death of William B. Shryock resulted within ninety days from the date of any accident, solely because of bodily injuries effected by external, violent, and accidental means, and independently of all other causes; and it also contained an express agreement that the insurance promised thereby should not cover any death which resulted wholly or in part, directly or indirectly, from disease or bodily infirmity. The defendant in error alleged that Shryock's death was caused by an injury to him which resulted from an accidental fall on the street. The association denied this allegation, and alleged that, if he was injured by such a fall, his death was not caused by that alone, but resulted wholly or in part from some disease of his heart. The burden of proof was upon the defendant in error to establish the facts that William B. Shryock sustained an accident, and that that accident was the sole cause of his death, independently of all other causes. If Shryock suffered such an accident, and his death was caused by that alone, the association agreed by this certificate to pay the promised indemnity. But if he was affected with a disease or bodily infirmity which caused his death, the association was not liable under this certificate, whether he also suffered an accident or not. If he sustained an accident, but at the time it occurred he was suffering from a pre-existing disease or bodily infirmity, and if the accident would not have caused his death if he had not been affected with the disease or infirmity, but he died because the accident aggravated the effects of the disease, or the disease aggravated the effects of the accident, the express contract was that the association should not be liable for the amount of this insurance. The death in such a case would not be the result of the accident alone, but it would be caused partly by the disease and partly by the accident, and the contract exempted the association from liability therefor. These propositions have been so lately discussed and affirmed by this court that we content ourselves with their statement. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Robbins, 27 U. S. App. 547, 65 Fed. Rep. 178, 181, 27 L. R. A. 629, 12 C. C. A. 544, 547; United States Mut. Acci. Assn. v. Barry, 181 U. S. 100, 111, 112, 38 L. ed. 60, 64, 65; Freeman v. Mercantile Mut. Acci. Assn. 156 Mass. 351, 353, 17 L. R. A. 758; Anderson v. Scottish Acci. Ins. Co. 27 Scott. L. R. 20, 28; Smith v. Accident Ins. Co. L. R. 5 Exch. 302, 305; Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Thomas, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 715; Marble v. Worcester, 4 Gray, 395, 397; National Ben. Assn. v. Grauman, 107 Ind. 288, 290.

In the opinion from which the above-quoted language was taken it was said that "the sufficiency of the evidence in this case to warrant the verdict is not before us for consideration, because the record before us discloses the fact that only a portion of the evidence presented to the court below is contained in the bill of exceptions." While this language was used, there was, nevertheless, in the opinion, such a statement of the facts as showed that, for some purposes, the bill of exceptions was in fact used.

We shall now review the authorities cited in the opinion to sustain the propositions that the insurer was not liable if, at the time of the accident, the insured was suffering from a pre-existing disease, and death would not have resulted from the accident in the absence of such disease, but the insured died because the accident aggravated the effects of the disease, or the disease the effects of the accident. The opinion in Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Robbins, 27 U. S. App. 547, 12 C. C. A. 544, 547, 65 Fed. Rep. 178, 181, 27 L. R. A. 629, was written by Sanborn, J., and in it were recited the following conditions of the policy sued on to wit: "This insurance does not cover disappearances; nor suicide, sane or insane; . . . nor accident, nor death, . . . resulting wholly or partly . . . from . . . disease or bodily infirmity, hernia, fits, vertigo, sleep-walking, . . . intentional injuries (inflicted by the insured or any other person)." The action of Melick, the administrator, was brought on the policy, and in the petition it was alleged that the death of the intestate, Dr. Robbins, was caused by an accidental gun shot wound in the foot. The answer denied this allegation, and alleged that death was caused by the intentional self-inflicted injury of Dr. Robbins in cutting his own throat with a scalpel. We quote from the opinion this language: "There was evidence that the doctor accidentally sent a bullet through the fleshy portion of his foot, on June 1, 1890; that the wound thus caused became very painful, confined him to his bed, caused a fever, and gradually reduced his strength, until he died, on June 18, 1890; that this gun-shot wound was just such an injury as would naturally produce tetanus or lockjaw; that the doctor and his physicians feared that disease from the first, and that they had used chloral and chloroform to relieve the pain and ward off this disease; that in the early morning of June 18, 1890, while the deceased was alone in his room, he was seized with tetanus; that this disease causes the most excruciating pains that human beings ever suffer; that it is fatal in a vast majority of cases; that it produces spasms or convulsions, and sometimes causes death by a spasm of the larynx, which prevents the passage of air through the trachea to or from the lungs; that the doctor was found dead in his bed on June 18, 1890, with a scalpel in his right hand, and his trachea and both his jugular veins cut; that the tetanus was sufficient to produce the death and the throat cutting was sufficient to produce it." In this connection there was a reference to the evidence tending to establish each theory as to the proximate cause of death, after which there was this language: "Under this state of the evidence it is assigned as error that the court below refused to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the insurance company, and it is contended that the question whether the shot wound which caused the tetanus, or the throat cutting was the proximate cause of the death, was a question of law for the court. In Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 475, 476, 24 L. ed. 256, 259, Mr. Justice Strong, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: 'The true rule is, that what is the proximate cause of an injury is ordinarily a question for the jury. It is not a question of science or legal knowledge. . . . In the nature of things there is in every transaction a succession of events, more or less dependent upon those preceding, and it is the province of a jury to look at this succession of events or facts, and ascertain whether they are naturally, and probably, connected with each other by a continuous sequence, or are dis severed by new and independent agencies, and this must be determined in view of the circumstances existing at the time.' This opinion of the supreme court is a complete answer to the contention of the plaintiff in error here. Union

P. R. Co. v. Callaghan, 12 U. S. App. 541, 56 Fed. Rep. 988, 6 C. C. A. 205, 208. It is urged that this question was for the court, and that the court was bound to declare that the cutting was the proximate efficient cause of the death in this case, because the evidence was uncontradicted that the cutting was later in time than the shot wound, and was sufficient to cause the death. This position might be maintained if the cutting was not itself produced by the shot wound, and if the evidence was uncontradicted that the death would not have occurred as soon from the tetanus in the absence of the cutting. But the argument begs the primary question in the case, whether the cutting was a cause of the death at all. If it neither caused nor hastened the death of the insured, then it was in no sense a cause of it, and, however new or sufficient it may have been to have caused it, it could not relieve the insurance company from a death whose sole cause was the accidental injury. This question was peculiarly one of fact. The insurance company had agreed to pay the promised indemnity from any death that resulted from the accidental shot wound alone. The question was, What did in fact cause the death,—the shot wound, the cutting, or both? Nor would this case be withdrawn from the effect of this rule if the evidence upon this question was undisputed, for the question is always for the jury where a given state of facts is such that reasonable men may fairly differ upon it. It is only when all reasonable men, fairly exercising their judgment, must draw the same conclusion from an admitted state of facts, that it becomes the duty of the court to withdraw a question of fact from the jury." Later than the above language was used, Sanborn, J., speaking for the court in this case, said: "The objection that the findings of the jury [adverse to the theory of the insurance company] are contrary to the weight of the evidence cannot be considered by this court. In an action at law, this is a court for the correction of the errors of law of the court below only. There was, as we have already held, sufficient evidence to warrant the submission of the question of the proximate cause to the jury in this case. The court below committed no error in weighing this evidence; that duty was performed by the jury and not by the court; and hence there is no ruling of the court in that regard for us to review; and it is not our province to review and correct the findings of the jury on questions of fact properly submitted to them. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 10 U. S. App. 640, 54 Fed. Rep. 481, 4 C. C. A. 454, 456; Lincoln v. Sun Vapor Street-Light Co. 19 U. S. App. 431, 59 Fed. Rep. 756, 8 C. C. A. 253, 257, 258."

The case cited next in National Masonic Acci. Assn. v. Shryock, 36 U. S. App. 658, 73 Fed. Rep. 774, 20 C. C. A. 3, was United States Mut. Acci. Assn. v. Barry, 131 U. S. 100, 33 L. ed. 60, in which the association sought the reversal of a judgment which had been rendered against it. On the trial in the lower court there had been embodied in an instruction the following language: "If, for example, the deceased sustained injury to an internal organ, and that necessarily produced inflammation, and that produced a disordered condition of the injured part, whereby other organs of the body could not perform their natural and usual functions, and in consequence the injured person died, the death could be properly attributed to the original injury. In other words, if these results followed the injury, as its necessary consequence, and would not have taken place had it not been for the injury, then I think the injury could be said to be the proximate or sole cause of death; but if an independent disease or disorder supervened upon the injury, if there was an injury,—I mean a disease or derangement of the parts not necessarily produced by the injury,—or if the alleged injury merely brought into activity a then existing, but dormant, disorder or disease, and the death of the deceased resulted wholly or in part from such disease, then it could not be said that the injury was the sole or proximate cause of death." We have found no language other than that above quoted which tends to sustain the proposition in support of which it was cited. This was so very favorable to plaintiff in error, however, that by that party it was not presented for consideration, and consequently was neither approved or disapproved in the appellate court. What was decided is fully stated in the syllabus, which was in this language: "A certificate or policy issued by a Mutual Accident Association stated that it accepted B as a member in division AA of the association; 'the principal sum represented by the payment of $2 by each member in division AA,' not exceeding $5,000, to be paid to the wife of B in sixty days after proof of his death from sustaining 'bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means.' B and two other persons jumped from a platform 4 or 5 feet high to the ground; they jumping safely and he jumping last. He soon appeared ill, and vomited, and could retain nothing on his stomach, and passed nothing but decomposed blood and mucus, and died nine days afterwards. In a suit by the widow to recover the $5,000, the complaint averred that the jar from the jump produced a stricture of the duodenum, from the effects of which death ensued. At the time of the death the association could have levied a two-dollar assessment on 4,803 members in division AA. Held: (1) It was not error in the court to refuse to direct the jury to find a special verdict, as provided by the statute of the state. (2) The issue raised by the complaint as to the particular cause of death was fairly presented to the jury. (3) The jury were at liberty to find that the injury resulted from an accident. (4) The policy did not contract to make an assessment, nor make the payment of any sum contingent on an assessment or on its collection; and the association took the risk of those who should not pay."

In Freeman v. Mercantile Mut. Acci. Assn. 156 Mass. 351, 353, 17 L. R. A. 763, the insured who died of peritonitis, localized in the region of the liver, and induced by a fall, had previously had peritonitis in the same part, and the previous disease had produced effects which rendered him liable to a recurrence of it. In an action upon the policy by the widow of the insured, the judge charged the jury that, upon the question whether peritonitis, if that caused his death, was to be deemed a disease, and the proximate cause of death, within the meaning of the policy, depended upon the question whether or not, before and at the time of the fall, he was suffering with the disease. If he was, then, although the disease was aggravated and made fatal by the fall, he could not recover; but if, owing to the existing lesions caused by the disease, he not having the disease at the time, peritonitis was started, the defendant was answerable, although, if there had been a normal state of things, the fall would not have occasioned such a result. On appeal these instructions were approved, but in our opinion they fail to sustain the radical proposition in support of which they were cited in National Masonic Acci. Assn. v. Shryock, 36 U. S. App. 658, 78 Fed. Rep. 774, 20 C. C. A. 3.

The case of Anderson v. Scottish Acci. Ins. Co. 27 Scott. L. R. 20, 23, was one in which a suit had been brought upon a policy which provided that, to recover under it an accident must be the direct cause of death, and that within three months, and that the company would not be liable for death arising from natural disease, although accelerated by accident. Upon appeal it was held that it had not been proved that the accident had caused the death at all, and the court expressly reserved its opinion as to acceleration.

In Smith v. Accident Ins. Co. L. R. 5 Exch. 302, 305, the suit was on a policy against certain accidents, in which there was an express provision that the company did not insure against erysipelas, or any other disease, or secondary cause or causes arising within the system of the insured before or at the time of or following such accidental injury, whether causing such death directly or jointly with such accidental injury. The insured on Saturday accidentally cut his foot against the side of an earthenware pan. On the following Thursday erysipelas was caused by the wound, and but for the wound he would not have suffered from it. It was held by a majority of the court that the insurer was protected by the condition, and was not liable. In the discussion of this case great stress was laid on the proposition that the policy expressly excused the company from liability on account of erysipelas which might supervene as the result of an accident.

The following is the entire report of Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Thomas, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 715: "In this action upon an accident insurance policy to recover for the death of the insured, the evidence showed that the insured fell on the 12th of June, bruising his side; that he was taken sick in a few days thereafter, and died on the 2d of July. The physicians testified that he died of typhoid fever, which did not result and could not have resulted, from the fall. A nurse of long experience testified that the insured did not have typhoid fever. Held,—that the evidence preponderates so entirely in favor of the theory that the insured died of a disease not brought on by the accident, the court should have set aside a verdict in favor of plaintiffs."

The syllabus in Marble v. Worcester, 4 Gray, 395, 397, correctly reflects all that was involved and decided in that case. It was as follows: "If a horse drawing a vehicle, though driven with due care, becomes frightened and excited by reason of the striking of the vehicle against a defect in the highway, frees himself from the control of his driver, turns, and at the distance of 50 rods from the defect, knocks down a person on foot in the highway, who is using reasonable care, the city or town bound to keep the highway in repair are not responsible for the injury so occasioned, though no other cause intervene between the defect and the injury. Thomas, J., dissenting."

In National Ben. Assn. v. Grauman, 107 Ind. 288, 290, the applicability of the case is indicated by the following paragraph of the syllabus: "Where the risk is limited to a case of death proximately caused by physical injuries of which there shall be some visible external sign, the complaint must make such a case; but the fact that the injury produced apoplexy does not render it any less the cause of death."

This completes a review of all the cases cited in support of the second paragraph of the syllabus in National Masonic Acct. Assn. v. Shryock, 36 U. S. App. 658, 73 Fed. Rep. 774, 20 C. C. A. 8, and it has failed to convince us of the correctness of the principle in said paragraph embodied. In our opinion, the question of what is the proximate cause of death, in an action like that now under consideration, is a question of fact, to be determined by the jury from a consideration of the evidence, and the determination of this question should not be withdrawn from the jury, unless from an admitted state of facts, all reasonable men, fairly exercising their judgments, must draw the same conclusion. These propositions are sustained by the authorities cited in Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Robbins, 37 U. S. App. 547, 65 Fed. Rep. 178, 181, 12 C. C. A. 544, 547, 27 L. R. A. 629, as well as by the adjudication of this court. Suiter v. Park Nat. Bank, 35 Neb. 372; Habig v. Layne, 38 Neb. 743; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Hildebrand, 42 Neb. 33; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Landauer, 38 Neb. 642. Whether the injury in this case was the proximate cause of the death of Shryock was purely a question of fact, for it involved the determination upon evidence of the relations between alleged causes and effects, and nothing more. It cannot be said that the evidence was so clearly in support of one theory that no reasonable man, fairly exercising his judgment, could have refused his assent thereto. As to the proximate cause of the death of Mr. Shryock, the special findings of the jury must be deemed conclusive, and in this condition we leave this branch of the case.

There was some contention that the statements of Mr. Shryock made a few hours afterwards, as to the cause of the injury to him, were not a part of the res geste, and therefore should not have been admitted in evidence. We have already quoted from the testimony of Mr. Robinson, a witness for the defendant in the district court, and a reference to this quotation will show that this witness, in response to interrogatories propounded by the defendant, repeated these statements of Mr. Shryock; consequently, we cannot say that it was prejudicial error to permit the reiteration of these same statements by witnesses examined in behalf of plaintiff. It was insisted that there should have been a demand for an assessment under the terms of the policy before suit brought, and that only a court of equity could grant relief. In the policy there was a provision that the association did not agree to pay to any certificate holder or beneficiary a greater sum than would be realized by said association from one assessment of $2 each upon all assessable holders of certificates, assessable at the date of the action. It is provided in § 110, chap. 48, Comp. Stat., with reference to fraternal benefit associations, that any such association shall not be permitted to issue a certificate to exceed the sum of $1,000 until it shall have at least 2,000 members. The certificate in this case was for the sum of $3,000. The association, therefore, could only insist that it had less than 2,000 members by showing affirmatively that it had been transacting business in violation of the terms of the statute which authorized its existence. This could not be tolerated. As $2 per capita on a membership of 2,000 would realize more than the amount of the claim of Mrs. Shryock, there was no necessity for invoking the powers of a court of equity for an accounting and assessment.

It is urged that the court erred in refusing to permit the introduction of the written testimony of Dr. Leonhart given on a former trial. As this proposed testimony was not embodied in the bill of exceptions, it cannot be assumed that its rejection operated to the prejudice of the association.

It is not considered necessary to state at length the evidence in relation to an alleged oral instruction to the jury. After a prolonged deliberation, the jury was brought into the court room, that it might be ascertained whether any assistance could properly be rendered towards bringing about an agreement upon a verdict; and the court, on finding this to be impossible, sent the jury back to its deliberation, requesting, however, that, if possible, the members should try to come to an agreement. No sufficient reason for concluding that this was prejudicial has been advanced, and we can conceive of none.

The questions involved in these proceedings have been, in the main, considered as general propositions, whether they arose upon the introduction of testimony or upon the giving or refusal to give instructions. We have considered all the assignments of error, and have found none to the prejudice of the plaintiff in error.

The judgment of the District Court is therefore affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

BELLEVILLE STONE COMPANY of New Jersey, Plff. in Err., Henry MOONEY.

(.....N. J.)

"The plaintiff was employed by the defendant to work in a quarry. It was a part of the system under which the quarry was operated that the foreman should supervise the preparation of each blast, and light the fuse to fire it, giving warning by a cry of "Fire," so that the workmen in the quarry might run out of danger. The plaintiff was injured by a piece of rock thrown out from a blast, because the foreman had, through negligence, failed to give timely warning. Held, that the giving of warning was embraced in the duty, owed by an employer to his employees, that the place where he sets them to work shall be kept safe; that the failure of the foreman to perform this duty care-fully was imputable to the defendant as employer; and that such failure was not one of those obvious dangers of which the plaintiff as employee assumed the risk.

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Essex County Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Howard W. Hayes and Joseph Coult for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Samuel Kalisch, for defendant in error:

The defendant company was grossly negligent in two respects: (1) In failing to provide proper places of shelter for its employees against the flying rocks resulting from a blast; (2) that the system adopted by the company in firing the blasts did not give the employees ample time to reach a place of safety, and that such a system was a negligent one, amounting to criminal carelessness.

The testimony of both the plaintiff and Kerr showed that as soon as Kerr was extricated from the chair they both fled as fast as they could from the place of danger for a place of safety.

It is not negligent per se for one person to risk his life or place himself in a position of great danger, in an effort to save the life of another or to rescue him from a sudden peril or great bodily harm.

DIXON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was struck by a piece of rock thrown out by a blast in the quarry of the defendant, and brought this suit to recover compensation for the injury. At the time he was in the employ of the defendant at the quarry, and was engaged as an attendant upon another workman who was painting a high derrick, and whom the plaintiff raised or lowered so as to facilitate his operations. The blasting was in charge of a foreman, whose duty it was to superintend the preparation of the blast, to light the fuse, and to warn the workmen, by crying "Fire," in time for them to run out of danger. On the occasion in question this warning was not given soon enough to enable the plaintiff to lower the painter to the ground and escape to a place of safety. Under the charge of the trial court, and the verdict of the jury, we must regard it as established that the plaintiff's injury resulted from the neglect of the foreman to give timely warning, and without any contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. This presents the real question of law in the case, which is whether the negligence of the foreman in this respect is imputable to the defendant, the common master of the foreman and the plaintiff. As was said by counsel for the defendant, the judgment must stand or fall on the answer to that inquiry. Under the cases of Nord Deutscher Lloyd S. S. Co. v. Ingebregeten, 57 N. J. L. 400, and Comben v. Belleville Stone Co. 59 N. J. L. 226, two views are suggested,—one, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the giving of proper warning was an essential part of the duty, owed by the employer to the workman, of taking reasonable care that the place where the workmen were engaged should be kept safe, and therefore if, through negligence, the proper warning was not given, the employer's duty was not performed; the other, on behalf of the defendant, that the giving of the warning was only incidental to the foreman's work in preparing the blast and lighting the fuse, in which work the foreman was clearly a fellow servant of the plaintiff, engaged in a common employment, and therefore his negligence in that incidental service was not chargeable upon the common master. On reflection, it will be perceived that the giving of warning bore no direct relation to the foreman's work in preparing and firing the blast. The object of that work was the removal of rock, and such object would be attained as well without the warning as with it, if we leave out of consideration the safety of the workmen. Quite different are the conditions where a person using a tool or machine is obliged to see that the implement remains fit for use. In such case the duty to examine is auxiliary and incidental to the duty to use, and, when a servant owes the latter duty to his master, he owes the former also. A failure to perform carefully this incidental duty of examination may result in damage to a fellow servant, but the common master is not responsible for such damage, because the duty neglected was not one owed by him outside of that duty. There may have been a similar duty of inspection owed by the master to his servants, but the duties themselves are distinguishable from each other. In the present case, however, as already pointed out, the duty to give warning was not in any such sense subservient to the blasting of rock. On the other hand, when we consider the general duty owed by an employer to his employees, to exercise reasonable care that the place where he sets them to work shall be kept safe (Van Steenburgh v. Thornton, 58 N. J. L. 160), the propriety of including therein the duty of giving warning, in such circumstances as those now before us, becomes at once apparent. The danger of blasting was one frequently recurring, and its occurrence could always be foreseen, not by the workmen scattered about the quarry, but by any person charged with the duty of watching for it. If the danger was not foreseen, and proper warning given, the quarry became an unsafe place for the workmen, but it was made reasonably safe if such warning was given. It seems clearly to follow that on him whose duty it was to take care that the place should be kept safe was cast the duty of giving timely warning. We conclude, therefore, that it was part of the defendant's duty to the plaintiff that proper care should be exercised in giving warning of an expected blast. In selecting the person who was to fire the blast as the person to give the warning, the defendant probably chose the man best able to perform that duty; but, as the defendant's responsibility extended beyond the selection of an agent, and included the warning itself, it must answer for negligence in the giving of warning, no matter how fit was the chosen agent. Nor will the doctrine that servants assume the obvious risks of their employment save the defendant in this case, for that doctrine is not applicable to risk arising from negligence in the discharge of the master's duty to his servants. No doubt the plaintiff took the risks of the system under which he knew the quarry was worked. He would not be heard to complain that places of refuge close at hand were not provided, or that other possible precautions, which he saw were not in use, were omitted. But he had a right to expect that the precaution which the defendant had provided for the security of the quarrymen should be carefully observed, and he did not assume the risk of a negligent observance.

The judgment under review is affirmed.

Faircloth, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

C. H. Morton and defendant agreed to have a horse race, and it was also agreed that the winner should have the other's horse. The race was run, and Morton was the winner, and they valued defendant's horse at $100, and, instead of delivering the horse, he gave his note to Morton for $100. All this occurred in the state of Virginia. Subsequently the defendant renewed said note for principal and interest, and gave the note sued on, which was assigned to plaintiff after maturity. The renewal took place in North Carolina. Without deciding whether the renewal was a North Carolina contract, we will treat it as a Virginia contract, according to plaintiff's contention. The defendant pleads and relies upon Code, 39 L. R. A.

§§ 2841, 2842. These sections declare that all wagers, bets, or stakes, depending upon any race, lot, or chance, etc., shall be unlawful, and all contracts, etc., on account of money or property so wagered, bet, or staked, shall be void. It does not appear whether there is any statute in Virginia denouncing betting on races as illegal. The statute law of another state is a question of fact, to be proved like any other fact. In the absence of such proof, in those states once under the jurisdiction of England, from which they severed their connection it is presumed that the common law prevails. Griffin v. Carter, 40 N. C. (5 Ired. Eq.) 418; Cade v. Davis, 96 N. C. 139. This presumption arises from the rules of comity among the states. This is not a right of either state, but is permitted and accepted by the states from mutual interest and convenience, from a sense of the inconvenience which would otherwise result, and from a moral necessity to do justice in order that justice may be done in return. Without this rule the law of one state can have no force in another. But there is no comity among the courts of different states. They administer the law in the same way and by the same reasoning by which all other principles of the municipal law are ascertained and guided. It is the duty of every state to look to the interest of its own subjects. Comity, being voluntary and not obligatory, cannot supersede all discretion on the subject. Vattel, at page 61, says: "It belongs exclusively to each nation [state] to form its own judgment of what it prescribes to it,—what is proper or improper for it to do; and it will examine and determine what it can do for another without neglecting the duty which it owes to itself." No state can demand the recognition of its laws in another, if they are deemed by the latter to be impolitic or unjust, of bad morals, or injurious to the rights and interests of its citizens or against its public policy. In Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 519, 589, 10 L. ed. 274, 308, Chief Justice Taney said: "And courts of justice have always expounded and executed them [contracts] according to the laws of the place in which they were made; provided that law was not repugnant to the laws or policy of their own country. The comity thus extended to other nations is no impeachment of sovereignty. It is the voluntary act of the nation by which it is offered, and is inadmissible when contrary to its policy or prejudicial to its interests." Story, Conf. L. p. 32. § 38, says: "In the silence of any positive rule, . . . courts of justice presume the tacit adoption of them [foreign laws] by their own government, unless they are repugnant to its policy, or prejudicial to its interest." Many other authorities to the same effect might be cited. Trasher v. Everhart, 3 Gill & J. 244; Pope v. Hanke, 155 Ill. 617, 28 L. R. A. 568. There is a difference between the right and the remedy. The courts will look to the lex loci contractus to construe the contract, but will not look there for the remedy. Bishop, Contr. (enlarged ed.) § 1871.

We are now to the question whether gaming, betting on horse races, etc., are contrary to public policy and injurious to the interests of the citizens of the state. If so, as we have said above, it is not obligatory on the state to recognize, nor the duty of the courts to enforce, such forbidden contracts. The statute (Code, § 2841), having existed in force nearly a century, affords pregnant proof that our legislature and people have considered that the acts prohibited would be dangerous to the public policy and interest of the state. "The vice aimed at is not only injurious to the person who games, but wastes his property, to the injury of those dependent on him, or who are to succeed to him. It has its more public aspect, for if it be announced that a trustee has been false to his trust, or a public officer has embezzled public funds, by common consent the first inquiry is whether the defaulter has been wasting his property in gambling." Flagg v. Baldwin, 33 N. J. Eq. 219, 48 Am. Rep. 308. The habit of gaming and betting is very seductive, and when indulged in, seems to seriously disturb the reason and prudence of the actors. We know, as public information, that many dealers in speculative stocks, depending on future contingencies, have found rest in insane asylums, leaving helpless families behind to be cared for by the state. In the case before us the charm for betting induced the defendant to give his note expressly "without offset," and without the "benefit of exemptions." We do not feel it to be our duty to enforce contracts fraught with such consequences and expressly forbidden by our own state law and policy, in deference to the presumed law of the lex loci, recognizing such contracts as valid. By the common law contracts of wager were not considered objectionable. When, however, the subject tended to encourage acts contrary to sound morals, the courts refused to enforce such contract. Gilbert v. Sykes, 16 East, 150. And when the act was against public policy or public duty, the court withheld its hand. Atherfold v. Beard, 2 T. R. 610. The case of Flagg v. Baldwin, 33 N. J. Eq. 219, 48 Am. Rep. 308, is one in point. The contract for speculation in stocks upon margins was executed in the state of New York, where it was presumed to be lawful and enforceable, and it was sought to be enforced in the courts of the state of New Jersey. The statute in the latter state is in substance, and almost verbatim, the same as ours. The subject was thoroughly and ably considered in the opinion, and it was held that such contracts could not be enforced in New Jersey, because it would violate the plain public policy of the state on the subject of gambling and betting, and the court said: "In this respect, such contracts are excepted from the rule of comity which requires the enforcement by the courts of one state of contracts made in another, if valid by the lex loci contractus." Such contracts as we have before us are unlawful and void, and are beyond the protection of law or the right of appeal to courts of justice. This court respects the usury laws of other states, but there is no likeness between our statutes forbidding usury and gaming, betting, etc. The former only affects the individual, for his benefit and protection, and the statute does not avoid the contract, but only forfeits the interest. We have examined the case of Scott v. Duffy, 14 Pa. 18, and find it does not apply here. The defendant in error loaned the plaintiff money in New Jersey to bet on an election, and he recovered it in a Pennsylvania court. The court said the loan did not arise out of the bet, or any bet, or to carry any specific bet into execution. The loan was independent of, and before, any bet was made. The lender neither played nor bet. Honor and good faith required that it should be repaid, and it did not appear that any statute in either state prevented it.

Affirmed.

Clark, J., concurring:

The note sued on was executed in this state. It was given in renewal of one executed in Virginia, the consideration of which was a bet lost upon a horse race. It is held that, against a judgment upon a note given since 1868, in renewal of one executed before that date, the debtor is entitled to claim his homestead. Wilson v. Patton, 87 N. C. 318; Arnold v. Estis, 92 N. C. 162. These are cited, and the reason given for them, in Blanton v. McDowell County Comrs. 101 N. C. 532: Because the creditor "must enforce the contract sued on, with the incidents attaching to it when it was made, under the then existing laws,"—i. e., laws existing at the time of the renewal. The same rule is applicable as to laws existing at the place of renewal. The first note was only evidence of the original contract; the new note is given in this state, but upon the original consideration (Hyman v. Devereux, 63 N. C. 624); and, when the attempt is made to enforce such new contract in our courts, we are confronted with Code, § 2841, which provides that all bets and wagers are unlawful, and all contracts on account of any money so bet or wagered are void. Of course, no action can be maintained upon a contract whose consideration makes it void.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Joel J. BAILY et al., Appts.,
v.
City of PHILADELPHIA et al.

(184 Pa. 564.)

1. A lease of city gas works is not an interference with the executive functions of the department of public works, within the prohibition of act June 1, 1893, art. 16, although by that statute the gas works are under the direction, control, and administration of that department.

2. The 'supplying of gas for lighting purposes is not a municipal duty, either inherent or under the Pennsylvania act of 1885, which regulates the exercise of the municipal power on this subject.

3. No delegation of any municipal power, legislative or other, which involves municipal duty, is made by a lease of city gas works.

4. A provision of an ordinance leasing city gas works that the city will not in any way interfere with, limit, restrict, or imperil the exclusive right thereby vested in the gas company, does not create a monopoly against public policy, where the franchise of the lessee is derived from the legislature and not from the city, and it merely makes the privilege exclusive so far as the city is concerned.

5. The inability of a common council to bind the discretion of its successors for a term of years in respect to a municipal or governmental function does not extend to a lease of city gas works in respect to which the city acts in a business capacity only.

6. No contract between a city and the holder of its bonds is created, with respect to the continued application of the revenues of gas works to a sinking fund, by an ordinance which, merely for the protection of the city, imposed on the trustees of the gas works the obligation of paying money into the sinking fund, where no pledge was made to the loan holders.

(February 21, 1886.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas No. 4, for Philadelphia County refusing an injunction to restrain defendant from executing a lease of the city gas works. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John C. Bell, Peter Boyd, George Tucker Bispham, and Joseph L. Caven, for appellants:

The ordinance is an interference with certain executive functions which are expressly committed by the act of June 1, 1885, to the department of public works, and with which councils are forbidden to interfere.

The act provides:

"Waterworks and gas works owned and controlled by the city, the supply and distribution of water and gas . . . the lighting of streets, alleys, and highways . . . shall be under the direction, control, and administration of the department of public works."

Where a city is equipped with the ownership of gas works, and where during a course of more than half a century it has, directly or indirectly, supplied light to the dwellings and places of business of its citizens from such works, it has assumed an obligation to continue the performance of that duty, although from its nature and character it was not one which it might have been compelled originally to undertake.

Eric City v. Schwingle, 22 Pa. 384, 60 Am. Dec. 87.

The city while it surrenders the direction, administration, and control of the supply and distribution of gas to its citizens, nevertheless assumes to discharge its duty to supply light in its streets and in private houses, not through the agency pointed out by the Bullitt bill, to wit, the department of public works, 39 L. R. A.

but partly through the agency of a contract with a private corporation and partly through the agency of city officials not connected with the department of public works.

The particular mode in which the city is to exercise its authority may be pointed out by the legislature; and while, in the absence of any particular method being indicated, the municipality may possibly adopt any mode whatever, yet if a particular means or channel through which the power is to be exercised is prescribed by the legislature, that channel must be followed.

See White v. Meadville, 177 Pa. 643, 34 L. R. A. 567.

The business (so called) is not private; it is carried on in the performance of a public power, and in the exercise of a municipal function conferred and created by the legislature.

Strawbridge v. Philadelphia, 2 Pennyp. 419.

The ordinance assumes in respect to the public lighting to delegate a public legislative power, and in respect to the private lighting to confer a monopoly on the grantee; and in both cases to bind the discretion of councils for a long term of years.

A public legislative power cannot be delegated.

The lease executed under the ordinance is a delegation of such power, and is therefore void.

If the terms of the lease are carried out, the United Gas Improvement Company has the exclusive right to occupy the streets for the purpose of laying and extending mains; no other company can possibly use the streets of the city for those purposes; the present mains cannot be extended unless the United Gas Improvement Company shall deem it necessary; and neither the city nor the citizens can obtain gas from any other source.

Contracts of this kind are void on the ground of public policy.

Corp. § 832 et seq., and cases cited.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The gas works are the property of the city of Philadelphia, not as a municipality, but as a business corporation. However much the idea that the city is not required by its municipal duty to supply its citizens with light in the streets and public places may seem to fall below the modern conception of a city, yet it is beyond question, on settled legal principles, that in the performance of that function the city acts under authority merely, and not under municipal obligation. This was the rule of the common law, and no statute in reference to the city of Philadelphia has altered it. Hence the city may change its mode of action, or cease to act altogether, in its discretion, and the discretion is purely legislative. The courts have no power to interfere unless the proposed action contravenes some express statute or violates some binding contract. These principles are elementary, and need not be enlarged upon since they are conceded by the learned counsel for appellants, and the corollary admitted, that the lease now sought to be enjoined would have been clearly within the power of the city prior to the act of June 1, 1885 (Pub. Laws, 37), commonly known as the "Bullitt Bill." The argument of the appellants is arranged under three heads, and may be conveniently considered in that order.

First, that the ordinance for the lease of the gas works is an interference with the executive functions of the department of public works, and therefore within the prohibition of the act of June 1, 1885. Of that act this court has already declared that "the subject with which it deals is the administrative government of cities of the first class, and its manifest purpose was to reform existing abuses in the executive department of the only city of that class." Com., Graham, v. De Camp, 177 Pa. 112. The particular provisions of the act which are relied on by the appellants are article 1, § 1: "There shall be the following executive departments: . . . Department of public works." Article 4, § 1: "The department of public works shall be under the charge of one director who shall be the head thereof. . . . Gas works owned and controlled by the city, the supply and distribution of gas, . . . the lighting of streets, alleys, and highways, . . . shall be under the direction, control, and administration of the department of public works." And article 16: "Councils shall by general ordinances provide for the proper and efficient conduct of the affairs of the city by the mayor and several departments, and the boards thereof; but they shall not pass any ordinances directing or interfering with the exercise of the executive functions of the mayor and departments, boards, or heads or officers thereof." These provisions do not take away nor in any degree lessen any municipal authority previously lodged in the city, still less any merely business corporate power. They merely regulate the operation of its executive and legislative functions as to such public property of the enumerated classes as the city may at any time have. The prohibition to councils in article 16 is against interference with "the exercise of the executive functions" of the departments. The lease or sale of the gas works is not an executive function. If it was, it would belong to the director of public works, as the head of the department. But no one would contend that the director has any power to make a sale or such a lease. This is a parting with the title and possession of the city which can only be done by a legislative act. As a legislative act, it is within the clear power of the city. The right to change the property which is the instrument through which the city exercises its powers is inherent in its ownership, whether municipal or merely corporate, unless prohibited by contract or by the terms of a trust upon which it was acquired. But, to avoid all doubts, the right of alienation is given in express words in the charter of 1789, all the powers granted in which were preserved by the consolidation act (act Feb. 2, 1854, § 6; Pub. Laws, 25), and which appears to be still in force. Com., Philadelphia Police Pension Fund Assn., v. Walton, 182 Pa. 378. And the right is not taken away by the act of 1885, which, as already said, merely regulates the mode of exercise of executive, and incidentally of legislative, functions without changing the rights which appertain to those functions.

But it is urged that, although the city may sell and change the specific property, it cannot abdicate the function, and must therefore substitute other property, through which its control and operation of the franchise may be continued; and the analogy is relied on of a trustee with a power to sell, who may by virtue thereof change the subject-matter, but cannot destroy the trust. This brings us back again to the preliminary question, on which the whole case rests, whether supplying the public places and private citizens with gas for lighting purposes is a strictly municipal function, or merely a power conferred on the city as a corporation. If the former, it is a duty as well as a power, and cannot be abandoned; if the latter, it is an authority only, and may be exercised or not, at the city's option. Although the appellants start out with the concession that the lease in question would have been within the city's powers prior to the act of 1885, yet the elaborate and ingenious argument for them rests upon the contention that the lighting of the city, at least since that act, is a municipal duty, and, though presented in different aspects and from different points of view, the argument constantly comes back to this contention, for without it there is confessedly no ground for the case to rest upon. But, for reasons already stated, we are of opinion that the act of 1885 made no change in the city's municipal powers, either inherent or statutory, but merely regulated their exercise so far as related to executive officers, and incidentally to such purpose restrained what had become legislative usurpation. Under that act, so long as the city owns and operates the gas works, it must do so through the department of public works; but there is no compulsion upon the city to continue the manufacture and sale of gas at all, or to do it through its own officers, if in its legislative judgment it is no longer expedient to do so.

The second proposition of the appellants is that the ordinance assumes in respect to the public lighting to delegate a public legislative power, and in respect to the private lighting to confer a monopoly on the grantee, and in both cases to bind the discretion of councils for a long term of years. It is manifest that this proposition in the use of the phrase, "public legislative power," comes back, as already indicated, to the contention that public lighting is a municipal duty. It is true that it is a legislative power, in the sense that it is the exercise of the will of the owner with respect to ownership of the property. If such ownership was coupled with a municipal duty, such duty could not be escaped by lease or other form of delegation. But the gas works, as already discussed, are held by the city as a business corporation. If the use of gas should be so far superseded as to make its manufacture and sale unprofitable, there is no compulsion on the city to continue it or to embark in any new venture for the supply of a different light; and if the management and operation of the works can be more profitably or more conveniently carried on by a lessee, instead of by the city's own immediate servants, the city, in making a lease, is determining a business question in its legislative corporate capacity, just as any private corporation might do, but is not delegating any municipal power, legislative or other, which involves municipal duty. In regard to the conferring of a monopoly, the appellants cite the provision in the lease that "the city of Philadelphia agrees that during the term of this contract it will do nothing, by ordinance or otherwise, which will in any way interfere with, or limit, restrict, or imperil, this exclusive right hereby vested in the said United Gas Improvement Company, its successors or assigns," and claim that this creates a monopoly which is void on the ground of public policy. To this objection it would be a sufficient answer that, as already held, the city in this matter is acting in its business, not its governmental, capacity, and the owner of business property, even though a municipal corporation, may, in dealing with it, make such terms as, in its discretion, it deems best for its interest. When the owner of a business sells it, with its goodwill, etc., he may agree, as part of the consideration to the purchaser, not to go into the same business again as a rival, within an agreed territory, or for an agreed time. The city of Philadelphia, selling its gas-making plant and goodwill, may do the same thing. But in the provision of the lease now under consideration the city does not assume to grant any franchise. It could not do so if it would. What the city does is to covenant that it will do no act in derogation of the right of the lessee under the grant to operate the gas works and supply the city and the citizens with light therefrom. The franchise of the lessee to furnish light is not derived from the city, but from the legislature, and whether it is exclusive or not at present, or shall be exclusive or not in the future, does not and will not depend on the city, but on the legislature. All that the city does is to agree that it will do no act itself whereby the privileges granted by it to the lessee, and intended to be exclusive so far as it is concerned, shall be limited or interfered with. This was clearly within its power in dealing with its business property. Whether the legislature may hereafter impose upon the city a municipal duty in regard to lighting which may conflict with its present contract is a question we need not consider until the case shall arise, with proper parties in interest to such a question.

It is further argued that the lease undertakes to bind the discretion of councils for a long term of years. This again comes back to the contention that lighting the city is a strictly municipal or governmental function, as to which councils cannot bind their successors. But, as already held, the city is acting in its business capacity only, and the contract binds it in that capacity. All contracts which contemplate things to be done after the immediate present must, to that extent, bind and limit the power of the contracting party. This principle has already been adjudicated in its application to the city of Philadelphia and the gas works in the cases of Western Sav. Fund Soc. v. Philadelphia, 81 Pa. 175, 72 Am. Dec. 730, 31 Pa. 185; Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 838.

The last proposition of the appellants is that the ordinance impairs the obligation of the city's contract with certain holders of its bonds. This was the ground of decision in Western Sav. Fund Soc. v. Philadelphia, 81 Pa. 175, 72 Am. Dec. 730. But the cases are not at all alike in the facts. In Western Sav. Fund Soc. v. Philadelphia, the ordinance of 1841 distinctly pledged the revenues of the gas works to the creditors for security of payment of the bonds, and provided for the management by trustees for that purpose. The ordinance of 1868, under which Mr. Campbell, one of the complainants, is a bondholder, has no such provision. The loan was made to the city, and upon the city's general credit, without any pledge of its revenues from the gas works or any other specified source. On the contrary, the ordinance gave express notice in § 4 that the terms and provisions of the ordinance of 1841 should not apply in any way to this loan. Section 3 of the ordinance requires the retention by the trustees of the gas works of a certain per cent of the amount of the loan, annually, and its payment into the city treasury; whereupon the city undertakes to apply part of it to the payment of the interest on the loan, and to pay the other part into the sinking fund. These provisions are not part of the contract between the city and the loanholders, but are terms imposed by the city on the trustees of the gas works as conditions on which the city will raise the money for the latter's use. Without these terms the city would have had to meet the bonds at their maturity out of general taxation, and could not have looked for repayment from the revenues of the gas works unless at the option of the trustees. By these terms the city guarded itself from this risk, and secured repayment to itself from the revenues of the department for whose use it had borrowed the money. But the requirements of this section were for the protection of the city only, and involved no pledge to the loanholders. They loaned on the general credit of the city, and perhaps also on the faith of the sinking fund pledged for the payment of this and other loans. But there is no averment that the sinking fund has not been kept up by appropriation from the city treasury from time to time, as required by law. Without such averment and proof, it does not appear that any obligation of the loanholders' contract has been impaired. None of the grounds on which the court is asked to interfere can be sustained, and the injunction was rightly refused.

Decree affirmed, at costs of appellants.

ONTARIO SPINNING COMPANY.

(184 Pa. 519.)

1. Recovery cannot be had for an injury inflicted by the head of an ax falling from a door in the fifth story of a building into the area way below, if it flew from the handle while it was being used by a competent person who had used due care in inspecting the instrument, and found no defect in it.
2. The mere happening of an accident is not sufficient to show negligence as between persons having no contract relations with each other, if other evidence shows due care under the circumstances.

(February 7, 1898.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for Philadelphia County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's husband. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William F. Harrity, James M. Beck, and Alfred R. Haig, for appellant:

Stearns was not an employee of the defendant. This fact distinguishes the present case from—

Wojciechowski v. Spreckels' Sugar Ref. Co. 177 Pa. 57; McKenna v. Martin & William H. Nizon Paper Co. 176 Pa. 306; Brunner v. Blaisdell, 170 Pa. 25.

Where a certain course of action has been pursued by any person without injury to others, and he, upon changing that course, injures another, the thing (unexplained) speaks for itself that such person has been negligent; or if something unusual happens with respect to the defendant's property, or something over which he has the control, which injures the plaintiff, and the natural inference on the evidence is that the unusual occurrence is owing to the defendant's act, the occurrence being unusual is said (in the absence of explanation) to speak for itself that such act was negligent.

Where the thing which causes the injury is shown to be under the management of the defendants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen when those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendants, that the accident arose from want of care, and the burden is upon the defendants of establishing their freedom from fault.

Shaffer v. Haish, 110 Pa. 575.

In consequence of what is inevitable, the head may, and at times does, fly off the handle of the ax, without negligence.

It would be a new departure from principles of law well settled, both in Pennsylvania and in other states of this Union, by reversing the judgment of the lower court, to hold that a man properly using an ax, in apparently good condition, is liable for injury occasioned by the slipping off of its head.

No presumption of negligence ever arises from the mere unexplained happening of an accident, but only from the attendant circumstances.

Proof of the fact that such a head did fly off, through a doorway, did not establish an accident of such an unusual character as to raise an inference of negligence. Had it been otherwise, any inference of negligence was prevented by the proof, adduced by the plaintiff, of the circumstances surrounding the accident which showed no negligence.

Fell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's testimony showed that her husband, while lawfully in an area way in the building in which he was employed, was struck on the leg by an ax head, and thereby received a wound from the effects of which he died; and that the ax head fell from an open doorway in the fifth story of the building which was occupied by the Ontario Spinning Company, the corporation defendant. The plaintiff then called Clement, an employee of the defendant, who testified that at the time of the accident he was using the ax in question in cutting or breaking the iron bands on a bale of cotton; that he had used the same ax for about two years, that he had never had any trouble with it; that he had frequently examined it, to see whether it was in good condition, that on this occasion, while he had not made any particular examination, "it seemed to be in first-class condition"; that he had noticed nothing wrong with it; that immediately before the accident he had been using it for about two minutes, and had cut ten bands from a bale of cotton; and that, when he raised it to strike again, the head flew off the handle, and out of the open doorway behind him. The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies where, under the circumstances shown, the accident presumably would not have happened if due care had been exercised. Excepting where contractual relation exists between the parties, as in the case of carriers of passengers and some others, negligence will not be presumed from the mere happening of the accident and a consequent injury, but the plaintiff must show either actual negligence, or conditions which are so obviously dangerous as to admit of no inference other than that of negligence. The burden which is thus thrown upon the defendant is not that of satisfactorily accounting for the accident, but merely that of showing that he used due care. It is therefore unnecessary in this case to consider whether proof of the accident and its attendant circumstances were sufficient to put the defendant to its defense, for, if any presumption of negligence had been raised by the previous testimony, it was a presumption of fact only, and was entirely rebutted by the testimony of Clement, the defendant's employee, who was the last witness called by the plaintiff. His evidence showed that he was a competent man and that he had used due care, and it was at the same time entirely consistent with the happening of the accident as described by the other witnesses. For to those who are familiar with the construction of the ordinary ax, such as the one in this case was shown to have been, it is readily conceivable that the head and handle may part although apparently securely joined; and to those who are familiar with their use it is known that they sometimes do so without previous warning. What, then, was there to submit to the jury? The defendant, as we have said, was not bound to account for the happening of the accident. He had been relieved by the plaintiff of the burden, if any there was, of showing the exercise of due care. The plaintiff's whole testimony not only failed to show negligence on the part of the defendant, but rebutted any presumption of negligence which may have arisen, and affirmatively proved its absence.

We are of the opinion that the nonsuit was properly entered, and the judgment is affirmed.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

ROYCE, ALLEN, & COMPANY

v.

Charles H. OAKES.

(..... R. I.)

1. The failure of a servant or agent to pay over on demand money which he has collected for his principal will not sustain an action of trespass on the case, but the only remedy is by assumpsit or debt.
2. An allegation that the neglect to pay over money collected for an employer was with the intent to defraud does not change the neglect into a tort.

(March 14, 1898.)

ON DEMURRER to the declaration in an action charging defendant with having collected money for plaintiff and fraudulently refused to pay it over. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. Van Slyck and Charles C. Mumford, for defendant, in support of the demurrer:

The count charges the crime of larceny under R. I. Gen. Laws, chap. 279, § 16, but does not allege that complaint has been made as required by R. I. Gen. Laws, chap. 233, § 16.

Embezzlement is the fraudulent appropriation of such property as the statute makes the subject of embezzlement, under the circumstances in the statutes pointed out, by the person embezzling, to the injury of its owner.

2 Bishop, Crim. L. § 325.

While it is true that a demand and refusal alone do not constitute an embezzlement under many statutes, that rule does not apply when the statute makes a "fraudulent conversion," embezzlement, or statutory larceny.

State v. Leonard, 6 Coldw. 307; State v. Taberner, 14 R. I. 272, 51 Am. Rep. 382.

Mr. Irving Champlin for plaintiff, contra.

Tillinghast, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Since the rendition of the former opinion in this case, sustaining the demurrer to the second count in the declaration (20 R. I. pt. 2, p. 3), the plaintiffs have amended said count so as to allege, in substance, that on the 15th day of January, 1894, they authorized and empowered the defendant, who was in their employ for hire, and acting as their agent and servant in this behalf, to collect and receive for them, from divers debtors of theirs, various sums of money, amounting, in all, to the sum of $1,714.60, and thereupon to deliver the same to the plaintiffs. And they aver that the defendant thereafter, in pursuance of said authority, collected said sum of money, and that thereupon it became his duty to pay over the same to the plaintiffs; but that, not regarding his duty in that behalf, although duly requested, intending and contriving to injure and defraud the plaintiffs, he neglected and still neglects to pay said money to them. And the plaintiffs declare that said refusal was negligent, fraudulent, and in violation of his duty, and that by reason of the premises they are deprived of the possession and benefit of said money. To this amended count the defendant has demurred, on the grounds (1) that the cause of action, if any, set forth therein, is an action of contract, and not an action sounding in tort; and (2) that the injury alleged to have been suffered by plaintiffs has been suffered by reason of the commission of the crime of larceny, and that it does not appear that any criminal complaint has been made therefor.

We think the demurrer should be sustained on the first ground. The amended count differs from the former one, which we held amounted to a charge of embezzlement, in that it does not allege a fraudulent conversion of the money by the defendant to his own use, but simply alleges a breach of duty in not paying over the same to the plaintiffs after demand made therefor. In other words, when stripped of its formalities, it simply shows a case where a servant or agent has collected money for his principal and neglected to pay it over on demand,—that is, a case of money had and received by the defendant to the plaintiffs' use,—and hence the plaintiffs' remedy, and their only remedy, is by assumpsit or debt. It is true, as contended by plaintiffs' counsel, that the action of trespass on the case is an exceedingly broad and comprehensive form of action, and that it lies, in general, where a legal injury is suffered for which the common law has provided no adequate remedy. 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 699, and cases in note 5. But, in a case like the one set out in said count, the common law has provided an adequate remedy in an action of assumpsit; and to permit the plaintiffs to maintain their action of trespass on the case would, in effect, be to abolish the distinction between actions sounding in tort and those sounding in contract, and enable a plaintiff in any case, where money has been had and received by another to his use, to sue in a tort action for its recovery.

In Orton v. Butler, 2 Chitty, 343, the same thing was attempted under a declaration the third count of which was nearly identical with the count now in question, except that there the plaintiff stated a stronger case by alleging a conversion of the money received, as the plaintiffs originally did in the case at bar. In sustaining the demurrer to the third count, Abbott, J., said: "The law has provided certain specific forms of action, suited to the recovery of damages, for certain peculiar injuries. We have a smaller variety of forms in our law than is to be found in the civil law. We have not many, but it is of importance that those we have should be preserved, and that parties should not be permitted by their own invention, to convert that which from the earliest times has been considered as peculiarly the subject of assumpsit or debt, into an action of tort. We are to look with jealousy at any innovation of that kind, so that nothing like a precedent shall be established, tending to destroy those sound distinctions which have been established by the wisdom of our ancestors." Best, J., added: "I am of the same opinion. This is a departure from all precedents; and, even if I were satisfied that it might not be attended with inconvenience, still I think we ought not to permit any innovation upon the ancient forms of proceeding, which are to be considered as part of the settled law of the land. As well might we alter the doctrine of descents as to freehold property as alter the long established forms prescribed for the recovery of debts. We are not at liberty to do so. There is a broad distinction between causes of action arising ex contractu and ex delicto. This is one arising ex contractu; there is no wrong stated, but merely a breach of contract; and the plaintiff is not at liberty to convert a mere matter of contract into a tort. The consequences of a departure from the ancient forms have been well pointed out in argument. In addition to those may be mentioned that, by altering the remedy, the defendant would be deprived of his plea of tender, and also of the advantage of paying money into court. But, if no such consequences were to follow, I think we ought to adhere to those ancient forms, which have been perfected by the wisdom of ages, and confirmed in their utility by the experience of many centuries."

It has never been understood by the bar in this state that a tort action could be maintained for money had and received, even though the person receiving the same has negligently and fraudulently refused to pay over the same to the person to whose use it was received, or has even converted it to his own use, except, at any rate, as provided by statute, after the commencement of a criminal prosecution. R. I. Gen. Laws, chap. 283, § 16. On the contrary, the understanding has always been that assumpsit and debt are the only actions that can be employed in such cases; and we think this position is clearly in accordance with the well-settled rules relating to common-law actions. The authorities cited by plaintiff's counsel do not, in our judgment, sustain his position. They are mostly cases of negligence for failing to discharge some common-law duty arising from a contract, and hence are proper subjects for trespass on the case. 1 Chitty, Pl. 151, 152. The celebrated and familiar case of Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909, is an example. Dickon v. Clifton, 2 Wils. 319, was case for undertaking to carry and deliver some malt for the plaintiff, and for so carelessly discharging his duty that the malt was embezzled and lost. Elsee v. Gatward, 5 T. R. 143, was tort for negligence in regard to the use of new material, instead of old, in the repair of certain buildings, contrary to plaintiff's order, which the court held to amount to a misfeasance, and hence a good foundation for the action. Brown v. Boorman, 11 Clark & F. 1 (see 8 Q. B. 511), is a case where the plaintiff employed defendant as a broker to sell and deliver oil for cash, but, not regarding his duty, he sold and delivered the oil without obtaining payment therefor; and the court held that case was a proper remedy, although the duty imposed upon the defendant arose out of an express contract. That decision gave rise to the supposition that every action for a breach of contract might be considered as an action of tort. But in the subsequent case of Courtenay v. Earle, 10 C. B. 78, the court effectually disposed of that impression, Williams, J., saying that the judgment in the former case by no means warranted such a conclusion, and that the court did not intend to overrule the case of Corbett v. Packington, 6 Barn. & C. 268. In the last-mentioned case, one count in the declaration stated that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, had caused to be delivered to him certain boars, pigs, etc., to be taken care of by the defendant for the plaintiff, for reward, and that, in consideration thereof, the defendant undertook and agreed with the plaintiff to take care of the boars, etc., and to redeliver the same on request; and it was held, on motion in arrest of judgment, that this was a count in assumpsit, and could not be joined with counts in case. Jervis, Ch. J., in referring to Brown v. Boorman, in the case of Courtenay v. Earle, 10 C. B. 78, said: "If the case of Brown v. Boorman were an authority to the full extent to which it has been pressed by [counsel] no doubt the third and fourth counts here might well be joined with counts in tort. But, upon examination, that case will be found to proceed upon this principle,—that, where there is an employment, which employment itself creates a duty, an action on the case will lie for a breach of that duty, although it may consist in doing something contrary to an agreement made in the course of such employment, by the party upon whom the duty is cast. And, if that be so, the case is reconcilable with the other cases with which it has been supposed to conflict." In Burnett v. Lynch, 5 Barn. & C. 589, cited by plaintiffs, an action of tort was sustained where it appeared that defendant was the assignee of a lease with covenants for certain repairs, which defendant neglected to make. Godefroy v. Jay, 7 Bing. 418, was tort against an attorney who undertook to defend an action, and so negligently conducted himself with reference thereto that judgment was signed against the defendant. See also Zell v. Arnold, 2 Pennr. & W. 292; M'Call v. Forsyth, 4 Watts & S. 179; M'Cahan v. Hirst, 7 Watts, 175, cited in Reese v. Reese, 49 Pa. 322, 88 Am. Dec. 503.

These cases, and others of like character which are cited, are clearly distinguishable from the case at bar, which is not based upon negligence proper, as that term is understood in the foregoing cases and in analogous cases, nor upon any common-law duty arising out of a contract, but upon a simple neglect to pay over money when due, as that term is ordinarily used and understood in declarations in actions of debt or assumpsit. The case of Ashley v. Root, 4 Allen, 504, seems to be an authority in support of the plaintiffs' position. But, in view of the fact that, in Massachusetts, the common-law distinction between actions of contract and actions of tort has been abolished by statute, so far, at any rate, as to allow the two forms to be joined in the same action, as it appears that they were in the writ in that case, the writ averring that the action was "an action of contract or an action of tort, both being for one and the same action," we do not think the case is entitled to that weight which it would be if decided by a court where the common-law distinction between such actions prevails, as it does with us. But, if that case was decided upon common-law principles, and not by reason of the statutory modification referred to, as it would seem to have been, then we have to say that the decision does not commend itself to our judgment as one which we should follow. All of the cases, save one, cited by the court in support of the opinion, are really cases of negligence, and, as we have above suggested, such cases are not analogous to a case of money had and received to the plaintiff's use which the defendant neglects to pay over. The very instructive case of Courtenay v. Earle, 10 C. B. 78, cited by the court in Ashley v. Root, 4 Allen, 504, does contain some general language which, if taken apart from the facts of the case, tends to support the decision; but when taken, as it must be, in connection with the question before the court, we do not think it does. The declaration in that case contained counts which, as construed by the court, merely alleged a promise to pay money upon a good consideration, unconnected with any common-law duty, and alleging, for breach, the nonpayment thereof. It also contained a count in trover. The defendant demurred on the ground of misjoinder, and the demurrer was sustained. A careful study of the case shows that it is not only not an authority in support of Ashley v. Root, but is quite clearly to the contrary. Reeside v. Reeside, 49 Pa. 822, 88 Am. Dec. 508, cited by plaintiffs, is different from the case at bar, in that the declaration there alleged that certain money was intrusted to the defendant by the plaintiff, who was the executrix of a will, to be used by him in paying the debts of the estate, and to return the balance, if any, to her. The declaration also alleged that the defendant accepted and received said money for the purposes of the trust, and entered upon the professional employment of the settlement of the estate, but, notwithstanding his duty in the premises, he fraudulently appropriated the money to his own use. The court, by Agnew, J., held that the declaration was good, saying that, "where a duty arises out of an implied undertaking to do an act requiring skill or fidelity that a breach of the duty may be the subject of an action of assumpsit upon the implied promise, or of an action upon the special case for the tort. . . . The breach of duty, and not fraud, is the foundation of the action. If, therefore, this were a case where the agent, having received the money of his principal to perform a certain trust, had wholly omitted to perform his duty, and converted the money to his private use, the entire breach of duty no doubt would expose him to an action in form ex delicto or to an action of assumpsit for money had and received to the use of the plaintiff." From the cases cited in support of the opinion, it would seem that the court treated the duty of the defendant regarding the money intrusted to him as a common-law duty, arising out of a contract for professional skill, and hence that the breach thereof would give rise to an action of tort. The reasoning of the court is not entirely satisfactory. But, even admitting that the decision is correct, the facts set up in the declaration were so different from the case at bar that we cannot treat it as strongly militating against the position we have taken.

Finally, we do not think that the mere fact that the plaintiffs in the case at bar allege in their declaration that the neglect complained of was with the intent to defraud changes such neglect into a tort. Hove v. Cooke, 21 Wend. 29. If this were so, we see no reason why any debtor might not be sued in a tort action, if the plaintiff should see fit to allege that he had fraudulently neglected to pay his debt, and thus revive imprisonment for debt. Demurrer sustained, and case remitted to the common pleas division for further proceedings.

being given by one who, after the refusal of the payee to discount it, advanced money on the note, which was committed by the sureties to the maker's hands for negotiation.

2. A contractor for city work cannot state from memory the state of his accounts with the city at a certain time when books showing such facts are accessible.

3. Sureties cannot testify to instructions to the maker as to the disposition of the notes against the holder unless he is shown to have knowledge of them.

4. Rejection of evidence is immaterial error if the complaining party has had the full benefit of it from another witness.

5. Sureties are released from their liabilities on a note made to raise money by discount by the fact that the nominal payee who was to make the discount never gave or received anything for the note, but merely indorsed in blank without recourse when a third person advanced the money on it.

6. The objection that the amount of the judgment is in excess of the verdict cannot be taken for the first time on appeal.

(October 27, 1897.)

A PPEAL by defendants Dunlap et al. from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for York County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of certain promissory notes. Reversed.

The portions of the record referred to, but not set out in the opinion, are as follows:

William E. Beattie, duly sworn, says: "I am cashier of the National Bank of Greenville, and have been such cashier about eleven years. I have no recollection of discounting, as cashier of said bank, two notes dated May 7, 1892, each in the sum of two thousand dollars, payable on demand after date, negotiable and payable at said bank, and signed by Ormand & Goforth, R. J. Dunlap, L. R. Williams, and L. K. Armstrong. I would not be positive unless I could see the notes. I made an examination of the books of the bank from May 7, 1892, to September 1, 1892, and found no record of having discounted such notes. I know of no other W. E. Beattie, cashier, except myself. The parties named have never at any time owed me personally anything. If the bank had discounted the notes, they would have a registered number on the back of the note, together with the name of the maker, the date of maturity, and the amount due. I have no recollection of transferring two such notes as described, payable to W. E. Beattie, cashier, to the city council of Greenville, South Carolina. I have no recollection of the city council of Greenville paying witness personally, or as cashier, or paying to the said bank, any sum or sums of money in consideration of the transfers of the said two notes, if such transfers were made." Cross-examination: "Our bank does a very large amount of business during the year. I can't remember every transaction which occurs in the bank. The president discounts notes as well as myself. The bank did a very large amount of business with the city council of Greenville, involving a large number of transactions, aggregating over one hundred thousand dollars, during the year 1892. I will not say that I did not assign notes to the city council of Greenville, such as those mentioned in my direct examination, but simply that I do not remember having done so. I sometimes have transactions in which notes are assigned by me without recourse, such having been made payable to my order; for example, where the printed form of our bank has been used, in which the amount of the note is made payable to my order as cashier." Redirect examination: "I have no recollection of the bank of which I am cashier having furnished Ormand & Goforth money on two such notes as described. Personally, I furnished none. I have no recollection of ever having received value for transferring such notes made on the bank's printed form, payable to my order as cashier; that is, where the notes were not discounted by the bank.

[Signed] W. E. Beattie."

Hamlin Beattie, sworn, says: "I am president of the National Bank of Greenville, and have held such position for twenty-one years. The president and cashier of our bank discount notes. I have no recollection of discounting, as president of said bank, two notes dated May 7, 1892, each in the sum of $2,000, payable to W. E. Beattie, cashier, on demand after date, negotiable and payable at said bank, and signed by Ormand & Goforth, R. J. Dunlap, L. R. Williams, L. K. Armstrong. I have no recollection of furnishing Ormand & Goforth any money on such notes. I do not know of any other W. E. Beattie, except the cashier of my bank. If two such notes as described were transferred to the city council of Greenville, I have no recollection of any money having been paid the bank or myself for such notes. I think I must have transferred these—two such notes—to the city council of Greenville, and that the cashier joined in the transfer. I cannot now explain how we, the bank, had control of the said notes.

[Signed] Hamlin Beattie."

South Carolina, York County. Personally appeared Lawson K. Armstrong, who, being duly sworn, says: That he is sick and unable to come to Yorkville to day. (2) That when Mr. Goforth came to him to sign the notes, he stated to him that they were to borrow money he had arranged to get from the Greenville National Bank to enable them (the contractors) to run their commissary, and to buy their dynamite at wholesale prices; and that this would enable them to work through; that he signed solely for the purpose of borrowing money from the party named in the note, and no other.

[Signed] Lawson K. Armstrong.

Sworn to and subscribed this 19th day of November, 1896, before me.

[Signed] H. E. Johnson, Magistrate.

The judge's charge was as follows:

"Mr. Foreman and Gentlemen: This is an action brought by this plaintiff against these defendants upon two notes,—to recover on two notes for $2,000 each, I believe (anyhow they are set out in the complaint), and interest. The plaintiff alleges that these notes were signed by the defendants, and that, for value, they came into their hands; that they paid the money for them, and no part thereof has been paid, and that they are now entitled to recover. The defendants admit the execution of the notes: all say that they signed it; but deny that these plaintiffs can recover; and set up certain defenses. They are largely—almost purely—of a legal nature. All of the defendants except Ormand, the surviving partner, allege that they were sureties on the notes: that is, that they signed the notes as sureties for Ormand & Goforth, and by reason of certain conditions which they had at the time with Ormand & Goforth, and which conditions were known to the city of Greenville, the plaintiff here, when they traded for the notes, that they are not bound to pay the city of Greenville. Well, now, on the trial of the case, the plaintiff has introduced certain testimony here, and the defendants have also attempted to introduce certain testimony. The bulk of that testimony, under the authority I have as judge here, I have ruled out; so, under the testimony before you, you are to find your verdict. And if you believe the testimony of the plaintiff that these notes were executed by Ormand & Goforth as principals, and that these other defendants signed as sureties; that the note was a negotiable note (that is, a note not sealed), made payable to W. E. Beattie as cashier, and Beattie indorsed that note, and the city of Greenville advanced the money for the value of the note,—then I charge you, as matter of law, that the city of Greenville is entitled to recover the full amount they have asked for here. Now, you have heard the testimony. It is for you to say whether you believe they signed as sureties; that Ormand & Goforth signed the note as principals, and these other gentlemen signed as sureties (they admit that, there is no dispute about that), then I charge you, as matter of law, if Ormand & Goforth, or either of them, carried that note to the city of Greenville, and there Mr. W. E. Beattie indorsed the note on the back (and there is no dispute over that), and the city of Greenville advanced the money for them,—then I charge you as matter of law the city of Greenville is entitled to the amount sued for here, and interest on it. The defendants have asked me to charge you: (1) As between the payor and payee of notes like the ones in suit, it is competent to inquire into the question of consideration, and, if none was given, the note would not be collectible by the payee. I refuse to charge you that. I charge you that, if this was a negotiable instrument,—and I charge that it is,—and it was carried to the city of Greenville, and Beattie indorsed on the back of it, as they admit he did, and the city of Greenville took up that note by paying money, they are entitled to recover. (2) The same is true as between the payor and any party to whom the payee may have transferred the notes, if such party knew that the payee had given no consideration for it. I refuse to charge you that. If the city of Greenville is a purchaser for value, they are entitled to recover. (3) If the payee of such notes, without having given any consideration to the payor, transfers it to a third party, who is acquainted with that fact, he would have no title, unless he could show that the payor, with the knowledge of such transfer, had himself taken the consideration from such third party. I refuse to charge you that. If you believe that these parties signed that note,—these sureties,—and put it in the hands of Ormand & Goforth, the principals of it, and they carried it to the city of Greenville, and got Beattie to indorse, and the corporation of the city of Greenville paid for it, they are entitled to recover. (4) If, as a matter of fact, the payor, who, with the knowledge of such transfer, had taken the consideration from such third party, was principal, and the other payors were sureties, and such third party knew these relations to exist, the note would not be binding against the sureties unless the principal was authorized by them so to act; and it would devolve upon such third party to show such authority from the sureties. I refuse to charge you that. Maj. Hart: We ask your honor to charge upon this point that the city of Greenville knew that Mr. Beattie had paid nothing for the notes, as Mr. Bostick testifies. Mr. Bostick, the city treasurer, says he knew that Beattie had paid nothing for them. The Court: I charge you, before the defendants can prevent a recovery, it would be incumbent upon them to show by testimony that the city of Greenville knew of the conditions that the sureties had made with the principal, if there were any conditions at all. The burden is not on the city of Greenville to show what these conditions were, at all. But, if these sureties made a condition with the principals, Ormand & Goforth, in order to prevent the city of Greenville from recovering, it is incumbent upon the defendants to show that the city of Greenville actually had knowledge of what those conditions were. You can take the record, and find a verdict. The form of your verdict will be 'We find for the plaintiff so many dollars,'—writing it out, and signing your name as foreman; or, if you find for the defendants, 'We find for the defendants.' Maj. Hart: May it please your honor, the testimony of Mr. Bostick, the fiscal agent, shows that he knew that the bank hadn't paid any money, and that he knew that Dunlap, Williams, and Armstrong were sureties on the note when he received it. Now, we want an instruction that, if the jury believe the testimony of Mr. Bostick, the city council of Greenville had notice. The Court: Gentlemen, you know what the rules of court require,—that these propositions of law have to be handed up before argument. It is a safe rule. The judge gets his mind set upon the propositions of law sent up, and when he is asked to charge propositions on the spur of the moment he has no time to digest them at all. I charge you, gentlemen of the jury, if you believe Bostick was the treasurer and fiscal agent of the city of Greenville, any notice to Bostick would be notice to the city of Greenville."

The exceptions are as follows:

"Thos. F. Dunlap, administrator, etc., L. R. Williams, and L. K. Armstrong, defendants in the above-entitled action, make the following exceptions to the rulings of his honor on the admissibility of testimony excepted to at the time; and to his charge to the jury, and his refusals to charge upon request; and accordingly each of them excepts to the judgment entered upon the verdict against the defendants."

"I. Rulings on testimony: (1) Allowing witness Bostick to testify to the acts and statements of the principal and the plaintiff's treasurer and the bank's cashier on the occasion of the bank's transfer of the notes in suit, the sureties not being present; and ruling that the sureties would be bound by whatever the principal debtor did in reference to the transfer. (2) Not allowing witness Ormand to testify from memory the state or result of the contractors' account with the plaintiff at the time of the transfer (that the contractors owed the city $1,500), because of the absence of the contractors' account, in which witness admitted on the stand the various items of the account had been entered. (8) Not allowing witness Ormand, or witness Armstrong, or witness Williams to testify to conversations between principals and sureties as to the purpose for which the notes were to be made, and the conditions upon which the sureties signed them; and ruling (as applicable to the point in issue) that, when the sureties signed the notes, and turned them over to the principal, 'that put it in his power to put it in the hands of an innocent purchaser, and it don't make any difference what the agreement was between the maker and the surety, unless the purchaser had notice of it he is not bound by it.' 'My idea about it is, it don't make any difference whether Beattie took up this note or the city of Greenville; that these sureties are liable.' And, in this connection, excluding the deposition of witness Armstrong. (4) Excluding the depositions of W. E. Beattie and Hamlin Beattie, respectively, offered to prove that the bank payee never discounted the notes, and so never had any transferable title. (5) Not allowing witness Williams, surety, to testify that he had never authorized anyone to make any other disposition of the notes except that stated at the signing.

"II. Charge and refusal to charge: (1) Refusing to charge: 'First. As between the payor and payee of a note like the ones in suit it is competent to inquire into the question of consideration, and, if none was given, the note would not be collectible by the payee;' and charging instead: 'That, if this was a negotiable instrument,—and I charge that it is,—and it was carried to the city of Greenville, and Beattie indorsed on the back of it, as they admit he did, and the city of Greenville took up that note by paying money, they are entitled to recover.' (2) Refusing to charge: 'Second. The same is true as between the payor and any party to whom the payee may have transferred the note, if such party knew that the payee had given no consideration for it;' and charging instead: 'If the city of Greenville is a purchaser for value, they are entitled to recover.' (3) Refusing to charge: 'Third. If the payee of such a note, without having given any consideration to the payor, transfers it to a third party, who is acquainted with that fact, he would have no title unless he could show that the payor, with the knowledge of such transfer, had himself taken the consideration from such third party.' and charging instead: 'If you believe that these parties signed that note,—these sureties,—and put it in the hands of Ormand & Goforth, the principals of it, and they carried it to the city of Greenville, and got Beattie to indorse, and the corporation of the city of Greenville paid for it, they are entitled to recover.' (4) Refusing to charge: 'Fourth. If, as matter of fact, the payor who, with knowledge of such transfer, had himself taken the consideration from such third party, was principal, and the other payors were sureties, and such third party knew these relations to exist, the note would not be binding against the sureties unless the principal was authorized by them so to act; and it would devolve upon such third party to show such authority from the sureties;' and charging instead: 'Before the defendants can prevent a recovery, it would be incumbent upon them to show by testimony that the city of Greenville knew of the condition that the sureties had made with the principal, if there were any conditions at all.'

"III. Because the judgment entered on the verdict was excessive, being for $36 more than the jury found."

¶ Mr. C. E. Spencer, for appellants:

The payee's indorsement as such transferred nothing to plaintiff.

Plaintiff knew of payee's want of title.

Knowing this, it was not necessary to rely on the indorsed words "without recourse," even if the effect would be to give notice of defect in that very title the validity of which the indorser of a negotiable note vouches.

1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 670, 700, 769, 789.

This knowledge put plaintiff in payee's shoes. It destroys the transferee's better title, which he would take but for the knowledge.

1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 789, 795.

Bona fides is required of the transferee; he must in good faith acquire the paper from his predecessor, and without notice of defect of title.

1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 770, 789.

Plaintiff has utterly failed to show that appellants are bound to the transfer through agency, or estoppel, or otherwise.

Ormand's alleged presence could not bind them.

James v. Benson, 155 Pa. 489; Weyman v. Perry, 42 S. C. 420.

Mr. James F. Hart, also for appellants:

W. E. Beattie, cashier, having paid nothing for these notes, and they never having been in the possession of the bank, nor ever having been delivered to or claimed by the bank, no title or property in them ever accrued to the bank.

Inasmuch as Beattie, cashier, knew that the bank had acquired no title or ownership to the notes, the act of the president and cashier of the bank in writing and signing a purported indorsement without recourse, was, as to the parties, a nullity, and as if the notes were without such writing and signing.

1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 174, 677, 679, 735, and cases cited.

The indorsement and transfer being, as between the plaintiff and the sureties, a nullity, no suit can be maintained by the plaintiff against them or any other party behind the broken link in the title.

If not a nullity, the city council had become a joint maker, and a cosurety to the notes by its indorsements after they were issued.

Baker v. Scott, 5 Rich. L. 310.

The indorsement of plaintiff's name as a cosurety was done after the note had been issued, but before it had been presented to the bank for discount, and without the knowledge of the sureties, and was erased after notes were pretensively transferred to it. This discharges the other sureties.

Rep. 161; Wallace v. Jewell, 21 Ohio St. 163, 8 Am. Rep. 48; Shipp v. Suggett, 9 B. Mon. 5.

If this indorsement did not have the effect to discharge the sureties, its subsequent erasure without their consent would certainly discharge them. And especially where the party had its name erased as a comaker and inserted as payee.

Aldrich v. Smith, 37 Mich. 468, 26 Am. Rep. 536; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 1387-1390.

The two notes did not possess in the hands of the plaintiff the character and attributes of negotiable paper.

Mr. Joseph A. McCullough, for respondents:

The testimony of the witness Bostick as to the acts and statements of G. C. Ormand, the principal maker, on the occasion of the transfer and delivery of the notes in suit to the plaintiff, was competent as a part of res gesta of the delivery of the notes.

Fowler v. Allen, 32 S. C. 236; Sullivan v. Williams, 43 S. C. 489.

When a surety becomes a party to a promissory note payable to a particular person, with the design of raising money to be used by the principal for a certain purpose, and the note is not discounted by the payee, but is discounted by another, and the money is applied to the purpose intended, it is generally held that the surety is liable for the note.

An immaterial diversion is where an accommodation bill or note is made for the purpose of loaning the parties credit generally, or where the substantial design for which the instrument was given is not departed from, or where the agreement for which the instrument was given and which is broken, is not one of substance and is unimportant. An immaterial diversion cannot avail as a defense.

The note sued on in this case being payable to "W. E. Beattie, cashier or order," and being by him indorsed in blank, is in legal effect a note payable to bearer.

Pope, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The above entitled action came on for trial before his honor, Judge Watts, and a jury, at the November, 1896, term of the court of common pleas for York county, in this state. After a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the entry of a judgment thereon, all the defendants except G. C. Ormand, as survivor of Ormand & Goforth, appealed therefrom. In order that the grounds of appeal may be understood, it seems to me that some reference to the pleadings, the testimony, and the charge of the circuit judge will become necessary. The complaint of plaintiff alleged that the defendants were indebted to it by reason of two promissory notes, executed in 1892, in the aggregate sum of $4,000, and interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent per annum from the 10th day of May, 1892, until paid, and costs. The answer admitted the execution of the two notes in question, but denied any liability to pay said notes—First. Because they deny that plaintiff is the lawful owner and holder of said two several notes, or either of them, by indorsement, transfer, or otherwise. They allege that neither W. E. Beattie, cashier, nor the National Bank of Greenville, acquired any title to the said notes, or either of them, and that plaintiff had notice of want of title at the time of said alleged transfers, if any were made, and that plaintiff paid no consideration therefor. Second. Because they allege that W. L. Goforth and G. C. Ormand were the principal makers and payors of said two notes, respectively, and that R. J. Dunlap and the defendants L. K. Armstrong and L. R. Williams were and are sureties thereto; and that plaintiff and W. E. Beattie, cashier, knew the relations of the several parties signing the two said notes. Third. Because they allege that the said R. J. Dunlap, now deceased, and the defendants L. R. Williams and L. K. Armstrong, as sureties, signed the two several notes, payable to W. E. Beattie, cashier, for the purpose of enabling the principal makers, Ormand & Goforth, to borrow money from W. E. Beattie, cashier of the National Bank of Greenville, for the purpose of completing in a speedy and economical manner the sewerage work undertaken for said plaintiff, then well advanced, and for the completion of which the said sureties had undertaken by their bond. And it was not the purpose of said sureties, or either of them, in making said notes, to permit the same to be negotiated to any other person or corporation or for any other purpose, than as herein set forth. And these defendants allege that the plaintiff, without authority from these defendants, took possession of said two notes without advancing to the principal makers the cash for the same, and gave said Ormand & Goforth credit on account for the value of said notes; and these defendants are informed and believe that the said two notes were misapplied by plaintiff to a previously existing indebtedness by Ormand & Goforth to said city council (the plaintiff), for which these defendants were in no wise liable, and of which they were then ignorant, and to other purposes not contemplated by said contract of suretyship. Fourth.

Because the defendants deny that they, or either of them, are indebted to plaintiff in any sum whatever upon said notes, or either of them; and because the plaintiff is largely in excess of the said two notes and interest on the same indebted to the said Ormand & Goforth by reason of work and labor done under this contract with the plaintiff in the construction of the sewerage system. I do not quote more from the answer of this fourth defense, so far as the indebtedness of the plaintiff to Ormand & Goforth for work done in the construction of the sewerage system is concerned, for the reason that this element seems to have been in some way eliminated from the action at the trial thereof.

The testimony is not voluminous. The following is a copy of one of the notes in question. The two were practically identical:

$2,000.00. Greenville, S. C., May 7, 1892.

On demand after date, we, or either of us, promise to pay to W. E. Beattie, cashier, or order, negotiable and payable at the National Bank of Greenville, S. C., without offset, the sum of two thousand dollars, for value received. Interest after maturity at the rate of eight per cent per annum until paid. Ormand & Goforth.

R. J. Dunlap.
L. R. Williams.
L. K. Armstrong.

Indorsements: "Without recourse on this bank. Hamlin Beattie, President. Without recourse. W. E. Beattie, Cashier."

F. J. Bostick, a witness for the plaintiff, testified, in substance, as follows: "As clerk and treasurer of the city of Greenville, I was present in my office during the morning of the 11th May, 1892. There were present several members of the city council; also the sewerage contractors, Ormand & Goforth. I am not positive both of said contractors were present. I am certain one of them was present. I think Mr. Ormand was. The two notes now in question were in the hands of members of the city council when I entered my office. The mayor and myself were instructed to indorse these notes. We did so, and I was then instructed to carry the two notes over to the Greenville National Bank, and tender them to the bank officials. Mr. Ormand went with me. When we tendered the notes at the bank, Mr. Beattie, as its president, said, 'The city council is now in funds, and let the city lend the money on these notes to Messrs. Ormand & Goforth.' Mr. Beattie then said that there was no need for the mayor and clerk and treasurer to indorse these notes. And he then, and also the cashier, wrote the words on each note which appear on the same above their official signatures. I then took the notes back to my office, and the mayor then erased his name, and I erased mine. The city council then ordered me to pay Ormand & Goforth $2,500 at that time, and $1,500 afterwards. In all, I paid Ormand & Goforth $4,000. This money has never been paid back to the city council of Greenville. Mr. Ormand was present all the time." On his cross examination he explained that the money was paid by his checks on the Greenville National Bank. The checks were produced and identified by the witness as having been obtained from the Greenville National Bank. This witness also testified that when the bank officers put their indorsement on the two notes nothing was paid to them, and that the witness knew that the bank had not advanced any money on these two notes. He also testified that he knew that Mr. Williams, Mr. Dunlap, and Mr. Armstrong were sureties on the two notes. G. C. Ormand was sworn as a witness for the defense. He testified that he was a member and survivor of the firm of Ormand & Goforth; that said firm had contracted to construct, and did construct, the sewerage system for the city of Greenville; that said firm began work about July 31, 1892. He also testified that he arranged with Dunlap, Armstrong, and Williams to sign the two notes. It was offered to read depositions made by Hamlin and W. E. Beattie, and also that of Lawson K. Armstrong. The court declined to allow the same read, on the ground of irrelevancy. Such testimony appears copied in the "case."

As the requests to charge appear in the grounds of appeal, it will be well to report the charge of the presiding judge and the grounds of appeal. We will now consider the grounds of appeal. The first imputes error to the circuit judge in allowing the witness F. J. Bostick to testify as to what occurred when the witness and G. C. Ormand went with the notes to the National Bank of Greenville, to attempt their negotiation with said bank, when its cashier, W. E. Beattie, was named as the payee therein, and when the defendant sureties were not present. It is certainly true that all the makers of these two notes placed the notes in the hands of G. C. Ormand as their agent to negotiate the same with the National Bank of Greenville. The defendants so admit in their answer, and such facts, except as to Ormand's agency, appear in the notes themselves. Why was it not competent for this witness, who was present as an interested person, to detail what occurred then in connection with the attempt at the negotiation of these notes? In fact the admissions of this witness as to what occurred then is made the basis of the principal defense the defendants rely upon. The testimony was relevant to the issues raised by the pleadings themselves, but, apart from the pleadings, when notes such as the present are in issue, any testimony in the line marked out by the terms of the notes is competent.

As to the second exception, relating to the competency of certain testimony, as pointed out in the language of the exception offered, by the witness Ormand. The judge was clearly right here. Ormand testified that books were kept by his firm, which showed the condition of the account of said firm with the city council of Greenville at all times, and that his knowledge was derived from such books, but that he was unable to state from his memory the condition and details of such account; also it did not appear that such books were not in existence. Such books were the best and proper evidence as to these matters. It was not error to deny this witness any right to speak of this account from memory as to the same.

As to the third exception. The witnesses Ormand, Armstrong, and Williams could not testify as to conversations of the makers of these notes at the time they were signed, unless it was first proved that the plaintiff, or some one or more of its agents, were told of these conversations between the makers. There was no effort to prove any such knowledge on the part of the city council or its agents.

As to the fourth exception, in relation to the depositions of Hamlin, Beattie, and W. E. Beattie relating to no consideration passing when they, as officers of the bank, wrote their indorsements without recourse upon the two notes. The defendants had the right to this testimony, but it was immaterial error, because the plaintiff, through its witness F. J. Bostick, fully admitted that nothing was paid to the bank at the time these indorsements were made by its officers.

Fifth exception, as to the admission of the deposition of Williams, one of the sureties to the two notes. The circuit judge committed no error in refusing to allow this deposition to be read in testimony. It related to the conversation alleged to have occurred between the makers when they signed the two notes, and no notice of such conversation was brought home to the city council or its agents.

We come now to the alleged errors of the circuit judge in his charge and refusals to charge. It is settled law that the charge of the judge must be restricted to the issues raised by the pleadings and the testimony in the cause. That portion of the Constitution of the state which requires that judges "shall declare the law" means that circuit judges shall declare the law involved or necessary in causes then on trial, and not that judges shall declare the whole of the law embracing all cases, civil and criminal. What were the issues tendered by the pleadings and raised at the trial? First. That the plaintiff could not hold the defendants to any liability on the two notes sued on, because the notes were on their face made negotiable by the National Bank at Greenville, but were not so negotiated. Second. Because the indorsement by the president and cashier of the Greenville National Bank, being without value, was a nullity, and did not and could not carry title to the notes to the city council of Greenville. Third. Because, even if such indorsement of said bank was valid, the city council were not holders for value, by reason of the fact that there was no value paid by the plaintiff for such notes. Fourth. Because the city council could not be holders for value, as against the sureties, by reason of the fact they took said notes with full notice of the conditions expressed in the face of said notes. Fifth. Because the city council of Greenville could not be the legal holders of said notes, because of a condition made by the makers of the notes at the time they signed the same, although not expressed on the face of the notes. Sixth. Because the city council had notice of the fact that the defendants, except Goforth, were sureties only, and therefore it was incompetent for Ormand & Goforth to vary the terms of said notes without the approval of said sureties; and, having done so, the city council of Greenville, as against said sureties, had no right to the position of holders of these notes.

I confess, at the outset, that this action, or rather the appeal therefrom, has occasioned me profound concern, for, on the one hand, the rights of holders for full value of negotiable notes are concerned; and on the other hand the rights of indorsers, who claim that their contract should be restricted by the terms actually employed by them in the notes which represent their contract, are involved; and, if I fail to mete out the law merchant in this cause, it is not by reason of the want of careful, protracted, and patient reflection on my part. The cases of Fowler v. Allen, 82 S. C. 229, and Sullivan v. Williams, 48 S. C. 489, establish the doctrine in this state that, when the makers—including sureties—intrust a negotiable note to one of the makers to carry out the terms of the contract, he is made the agent of such makers. Now, I wish to be understood correctly just here. I do not mean that any general agency is thus created; that such an agent can do anything and everything, but such agent can do everything within the contemplation of the contract as expressed therein. Now, it is admitted on all hands that the firm of Ormand & Goforth were intrusted with these notes after the parties had signed the same. What was the admitted purpose of these notes? The defendants, in their answer, say it was their "purpose of enabling the principal makers, Ormand & Goforth, to borrow money from W. E. Beattie, cashier of the National Bank of Greenville, for the purpose of completing in a speedy and economical manner the sewerage work undertaken for said plaintiff, then well advanced, and for the completion of which the said sureties had undertaken by their bond." (Italics mine.) The contract for the sewerage work was begun about April 1, 1892, and completed in September, 1892. It is not claimed that there was any diversion of any of these funds arising from the negotiation of these two notes. It is true, in this connection, that the defendant sureties in their answer did claim that the notes did not yield to Ormand & Goforth any money, but that the sum was given as a credit on Ormand & Goforth's account with the city council of Greenville on the sewerage contract; but the testimony was absolutely convincing in the cause that $4,000 was paid in cash by the city council of Greenville to Ormand & Goforth on these two notes; so, in the charge of the judge, there was no request from defendants in reference to the fact that money was not paid by the city council of Greenville to Ormand & Goforth on these two notes. Thus they left it as a fact to be determined by the jury whether the city council paid value for the notes; and by the verdict of the jury it was established that the city council did pay value for the notes. And it will appear by reference to the requests to charge that the defendant sureties made their battle on the ground that they alone contracted in their notes for the sum to be negotiated at the Greenville National Bank, and by no other person or corporation. We have already seen that there was no material diversion of the funds which it was agreed between the makers should be realized by the negotiation of this note, and that the $4,000 named in the two notes was actually paid to Ormand & Goforth by the city council. It remains, then, to determine if the surety defendants are released by the fact that the officers of the bank at Greenville did not actually pay any money or receive any money. To test this matter practically, what would have been the result if the city council of Greenville had paid the $4,000 without the notes ever having been carried to the National Bank of Greenville? I think, under the authority of Pease v. Dwight, 47 U. S. 9 How. 190, 12 L. ed. 399, the city council of Greenville could maintain this action under that decision. It was held that the statute of 3 & 4 Anne, chap. 9, would be answered in case of a note reciting in its body that "Walter Chester and Pease, Chester, & Co., or order" were the payees, if only Pease, Chester, & Co., with which firm Walter Chester was in no wise connected, indorsed said note, and Walter Chester refused to indorse said note. The principle affirmed was that, inasmuch as the plaintiff Dwight, who had paid full value for the note upon the indorsement of it by one of the payees, to wit, Pease, Chester, & Co., this decision was made to answer the old requirements as to ownership of commercial paper payable by "order," which requirements were very strict in the matter of the indorsement of such paper, to enable one as indorsee to maintain his action. But now, under the changes wrought by our Code of Procedure, it is not necessary that a holder for value of such paper should have the same indorsed to him; for, if he is the legal owner and holder of such note, he not only may sue, but he alone can sue, except in cases of certain trusts. It seems to me that, when the indorsement in blank without recourse appeared upon these two notes by the said National Bank of Greenville, although they neither received nor paid a dollar therefor, it did not interfere with the rights of the surety makers of the note. If the bank had discounted the paper in due course of business, it was in the power of the bank the next minute to transfer such paper to anyone else, so that their indorsement in blank was without actually discounting the paper itself to enable a third party (as the city council of Greenville) to pay every dollar to the makers, Ormand & Goforth, to thereby become the lawful owners and holders of said paper. Now, I admit that the city council of Greenville could not have acquired those notes except by the payment of the $4,000, as contemplated by the makers; in other words, they could not have taken that paper, and applied it to the payment of any balance due to them by Ormand & Goforth under this contract to construct a sewerage system for the city. It seems to me that the case of Powell v. Waters, 17 Johns. 176, where A made a note payable to B, or order, was indorsed by B for the purpose of being discounted at a bank, and negotiated to a third person with a full knowledge of the circumstances, and the holder was allowed to recover, is fully up to the point involved in this case. I am inclined to hold that the use of the name of the cashier of the bank as payee, and also the making of the note negotiable at such bank, merely put it in the power of these sureties to prevent any diversion of such notes to any other purpose than raising the $4,000. This was effected in the case of Dogan v. Dubois, 2 Rich. Eq. 85. It appears in that case that one Dubois was in business at Union, in this state, and desiring to raise $2,000 in cash, he applied to William Rice to indorse a note for that amount at a bank in the city of Columbia, South Carolina. When Dubois applied to Rice, the note already had the name of John Gist as payee and indorser thereon. Rice paid $2,000 in cash, and carried the note to the bank, when, upon his indorsement, the bank cashed the note for him. Before the maturity of this note, Dubois applied to Glenn and Shelton to indorse a new note, also payable at the bank for a like sum, to renew the first note, on which John Gist and Rice appeared as indorsers. They did so, Glenn being first indorser, and Shelton second indorser. This note was sent by Dubois to Rice, who was then in Columbia, with $20 in cash, directing said Rice to carry the note to the bank for discount in substitution of the first note. Before Rice could apply to the bank with this second note, Glenn became alarmed as to Dubois, and at once wrote to the bank, refusing to stand as indorser on the note and also making demand upon Rice for the note he had indorsed, and in Rice's hands, as aforesaid. Rice refused to deliver the note. Afterwards Rice did. It was found by a jury that John Gist's name on the note was a forgery, and Rice had to pay the first note to the bank. Thereupon Glenn had received a mortgage from Dubois to protect him as indorser. Dubois' general creditors attached his property, and obtained judgments for their respective debts. Glenn and the executors of Rice made this agreement: That Glenn would confess a judgment for the $2,000 note, and that the executors of Rice would satisfy the same of record at once, but Glenn was to execute the transfer of the mortgage Dubois had given him to such executors. This agreement was fulfilled. The general creditors of Dubois, whose claims had been reduced to judgment, claimed that such assignment of the mortgage by Glenn to the executors of Rice was null and void, as Glenn had not in fact any claim against Dubois, and therefore Dubois's mortgage to Glenn was a nullity. The court held that Glenn, as an accommodation indorser on Dubois's note made payable at the bank and in the hands of Rice, as Dubois's agent for that purpose, had a perfect right to withdraw from his engagement as such accommodation indorser at any time before the note was negotiated at the bank, and also that the note was in the hands of Rice purely as the agent of Dubois to be negotiated at the bank to renew the old note, and that Rice could not direct it to any other purposes. The court adjudged that no rights in Glenn, as to the mortgage of Dubois to him, had any existence. It will be seen that in the case just considered no consideration passed from Rice to Dubois on the second note; hence this decision does not antagonize the position I have taken in the case at bar; but this case is authority for the position that an accommodation indorser may withdraw his name from a note at any time before the note is actually negotiated. I make this observation to dispose of any question, if it had been made (and it was not), that the city council had no right to withdraw their intended indorsements as accommodation makers of these notes. No actual negotiation of such notes for value had been made when the mayor and city clerk erased their names as accommodation indorsers. But no such question is raised in this case, and therefore this decision is unwarranted. I cannot agree that the circuit judge committed any error in his charge as pointed out in the exceptions here presented.

The last exceptions related to the matter of an increase in the amount of the judgment over the verdict rendered. This court, in law cases, is confined, to the correction of errors of law in the court below. I see no evidence in the "case" for appeal that any such question has been presented to or passed upon by the circuit judge. This seems to me, therefore, the first time any court had its attention called to this matter. I must decline to consider it, but without prejudice to any application to the circuit court for a correction in the amount of the judgment in excess of the verdict. The foregoing presents my own views of the merits of this appeal, and I think the judgment of this court should be, it is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed. But the majority of the court think otherwise, and therefore, as the organ of the court, I announce its judgment that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, but I dissent from that judgment.

McIver, Ch. J.:

I dissent. It must be remembered that this appeal involves only the rights of sureties, who, as is well settled, are entitled to stand upon the terms of their contract as expressed in the paper evidencing such contract. Here, by the express terms of the notes, which constitute the only evidence of the contract which the plaintiffs are seeking to enforce, the appellants bound themselves to pay to W. E. Beattie, cashier, or order, negotiable and payable at the National Bank of Greenville, South Carolina, a specified sum of money. This obligation, by its terms, rendered appellants liable to pay to said Beattie, or to any person to whom he might legally transfer such obligation, the sum of money specified therein, and did not create any liability to pay the same to any other person. When the plaintiff brought this action to enforce performance of the contract of appellants, it must not only show that appellants executed said notes (as to which there is no evidence), but it must also show that the same have been duly transferred to the plaintiff by the payee named in said notes, or some subsequent lawful transferee thereof; and as to this it seems to me that the plaintiff has failed to make out its case. The undisputed testimony introduced by the plaintiff itself shows that the plaintiff never acquired a legal title to the notes. Beattie never acquired a legal title to these notes, as he expressly refused to accept them; and, if he acquired no legal title, I do not see how he could transfer any title to the plaintiff through its treasurer, Bostwick, who was the agent of plaintiff in the transaction; and notice to the agent was notice to the principal. The plaintiff cannot, therefore, claim to be an innocent holder for value, without notice. If plaintiff had acquired these notes in the regular course of business, without notice, then the result would perhaps be different. Of course, if Ormand & Goforth received the money specified in the notes from the plaintiff, as the testimony seems to show, then they would be liable upon that ground; but not so as to appellants, who are mere sureties, and can only be held liable on their contract as they made it. They could not be held liable to Beattie, because he never accepted the notes, and never made any contract with them, and they cannot be held liable to any person to whom he transferred the notes without authority, who had notice of such want of authority.

Gary, A. J.:

As I do not concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice Pope, I will state briefly the grounds of my dissent. After the notes were signed by Ormand & Goforth as principals and R. J. Dunlap, L. R. Williams, and L. K. Armstrong as sureties, they were indorsed by W. W. Gilreath, mayor, and T. J. Bostwick, clerk and treasurer, of the city of Greenville, by authority of the city council of Greenville. The plaintiff thus became a cosurety with other sureties who had signed the notes. At the time the city council of Greenville indorsed the notes as aforesaid, it knew that R. J. Dunlap, L. R. Williams, and L. K. Armstrong were sureties on said notes. When Hamlin Beattie, as president, and W. E. Beattie, as cashier, of the National Bank of Greenville, indorsed the notes in the manner set forth in the opinion of Mr. Justice Pope, the city council of Greenville was a cosurety with other sureties. It was after the notes were indorsed by Hamlin Beattie and W. E. Beattie as aforesaid that the city council of Greenville erased its indorsements upon the notes. As the plaintiff was a cosurety with the other sureties at the time it alleges in the complaint that it became the lawful owner and holder of said notes, his honor, the presiding judge, was in error in charging the jury: "If you believe the testimony of the plaintiff that these notes were executed by Ormand & Goforth as principals, and that these other defendants signed as sureties; that the note was a negotiable note (that is, a note not sealed), made payable to W. E. Beattie as cashier, and Beattie indorsed that note, and the city council of Greenville advanced the money for the value of the note,—then I charge you, as matter of law, that the city council of Greenville is entitled to recover the full amount they have asked for here." Under this charge the jury had the right to render a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount mentioned in the notes, although they might have believed from the testimony that the plaintiff was liable to a cosurety. Furthermore, whatever other rights the plaintiff may have acquired in the notes, it did not become the lawful owner and holder thereof by the indorsement of the officers of the national bank of Greenville, as alleged in the complaint, for the following reasons: The notes were executed for the purpose of raising money by discount, which fact was known both to W. E. Beattie, cashier, and the plaintiff herein. As W. E. Beattie, cashier, did not discount the notes, which was the condition upon which he was to become the lawful owner and holder thereof, he did not acquire such rights; and, as the plaintiff had notice of these facts, it could not become the lawful owner, and holder of these notes by the indorsement of W. E. Beattie, cashier, as alleged in the complaint. W. E. Beattie, cashier, occupied the position of the payee of a note in possession thereof without consideration, and therefore void. The plaintiff, with knowledge of these facts, could not, by the indorsement of W. E. Beattie, cashier, become the lawful owner and holder thereof. I therefore think the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed, and the case remanded to that court for a new trial.

Re Proceeding to Disbar Joe KIRBY.

1. An order for an attorney at law to show cause why he should not be disbarred is not a process within the meaning of a constitutional provision requiring process to be in the name of the state.
 2. A statute providing for disbarment of an attorney when he has been convicted of felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude is not repealed by a subsequent one authorizing his disbarment for cause shown, although one section of the latter statute provides that when he is charged with embezzlement or other professional misconduct he shall be ordered to show cause why he shall not be disbarred, and the matter shall be referred to a committee for hearing.
 3. An attorney convicted of an offense punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary is guilty of felony within the meaning of a statute authorizing disbarment.
 4. Receiving property of the government, knowing it to have been stolen, with intent to convert the same to one's own use is an offense involving moral turpitude.
 5. A properly authenticated record of conviction of crime in a Federal court may by statute be made admissible in a proceeding to disbar the accused as an attorney in a state court.
 6. A proceeding for disbaring an attorney is a civil proceeding.
 7. A writ of error and supersedeas in a proceeding in which an attorney has been convicted of felony are matters of defense which he must prove in a proceeding to disbar him on account of the conviction.
 8. The effect of a conviction of felony as a ground for disbaring an attorney is not annulled by a writ of error and supersedeas.
- On rehearing.*
9. Persons who institute proceedings to disbar an attorney are entitled to their costs as against him in case the proceeding is successful.

ORIGINAL PROCEEDINGS to disbar Joe Kirby. Disbarment decreed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. G. Hartley and A. B. Kittredge for accusers.

Mr. Joe Kirby, in propria persona:

This court erred in holding that a "conviction" was had within the meaning of § 473, Comp. Laws, regardless of the appeal therefrom pending, and supersedeas granted.

Where we adopt a statute from a sister state, we likewise adopt the interpretation which it has there received. Although the statute is taken bodily from California, your honors refuse to follow the interpretation placed thereon by the highest court of that state.

People v. Treadwell, 66 Cal. 400.

Comp. Laws, § 2559 reads: "Divorces may be granted for any of the following causes: . . . Conviction of Felony."

According to the line of reasoning your honors have adopted in an action for divorce, based on this statutory ground, the question would not be the guilt of the defendant but the conviction. No other court has ever, under such a statute, taken such a view.

This court erred in holding that the instrument by which it was sought to gain jurisdiction of me was not a process.

You may call this original instrument what you wish, a summons, a citation, original notice, order, or otherwise, but it still remains a process, and as such must issue in the name of the state.

Such constitutional provision is mandatory.

Haney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding was commenced in this court for the purpose of having the name of the accused stricken from the roll of attorneys and counselors of this court, and his license revoked, or to have him suspended from practice for such time as shall seem just. A verified accusation was presented to the court by A. B. Kittredge, Esq., and C. G. Hartley, Esq., attorneys and counselors at law of this court, wherein it is alleged that the accused, who is an attorney and counselor at law of this court, was on October 30, 1896, duly indicted in the United States district court within and for the District of South Dakota, charged with the crime of receiving property of the United States with intent to convert the same to his own use and gain, knowing the same to have been stolen, to which charge he pleaded not guilty; that on June 12, 1897, he was duly convicted by a verdict of a jury of the crime charged; that on June 25, 1897, he was duly sentenced to be imprisoned at hard labor in the penitentiary at Sioux Falls, in this state, for the period of two years; that such conviction and sentence are still in force and effect; and that the crime for which he was convicted is a felony, and one involving moral turpitude. To such accusation was attached a duly authenticated copy of the record of such conviction. Upon reading and filing such accusation and authenticated copy of the record of such conviction, this court issued an order requiring the accused to show cause on the first day of the present term, before this court, why he should not be suspended or disbarred from practicing as an attorney at law, and directing the clerk of this court to forthwith serve upon and deliver to the accused a duly certified copy of such order and accusation. In response to this order the accused appeared specially, and objected to the court assuming jurisdiction for the following reasons: (1) Such proceeding does not appear to be prosecuted by either the public, state, or an individual; (2) the process under which it is sought to bring the accused into court is not issued in the name of the state, nor in the name of any private individual nor any public prosecutor. He also objected to A. B. Kittredge "purporting to appear and argue this matter, for the reason he does not appear in behalf of any client or otherwise." The order to show cause is preceded by these words: "State of South Dakota. In the Supreme Court. April Term, A. D. 1897. In Re Proceeding to Disbar Joe Kirby as an Attorney at Law." The foregoing objections were overruled; a majority of the court being of the opinion that the order to show cause issued in this proceeding is not a process, within the meaning of § 38, art. 5, of the state Constitution. In this ruling I did not concur, thinking that the order to show cause should have contained the words, "The state of South Dakota sends greeting to Joe Kirby," and that it should be amended by inserting such words. Const. art. 5, § 38; Comp. Laws, § 4807; Mitchell v. Conley, 13 Ark. 414; McKadden v. Fortier, 20 Ill. 509. In any event, the ruling did not prejudice the rights of the accused in any substantial respect. He received due notice, a copy of the accusation, and was given ample opportunity to appear and defend. Thereupon the accused demurred to the accusation upon the following grounds: "(1) The same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; (2) that the court has no jurisdiction of this demurrant; and (3) that said accusation shows on its face facts which entitle the demurrant to his discharge." Decision upon the demurrer was reserved, and the accused filed an answer, wherein it is admitted that Messrs. Kittredge and Hartley are citizens and residents of the county of Minnehaha and state of South Dakota, duly admitted to practise as attorneys and counselors at law in this court; that accused is a resident of Minnehaha county, in this state, and has been duly admitted to practice as an attorney and counselor at law in this court. The answer denies each and every allegation of the accusation not expressly admitted, and alleges "that upon said sentence being pronounced in the said district court of the United States, a large number of exceptions having been, during the progress of the trial, taken, settled, and certified by the judge of said court, the said court and judge thereof, by writ of error duly and legally issued from the Supreme Court of the United States, was required to certify said exceptions and proceedings to the said supreme court as provided by law, in order that the action of the trial court might be reversed and reviewed; and thereupon the trial court and judge thereof did find that there was probable cause to believe that error had been committed upon said trial, and that the action of said trial court should be reversed, and thereupon the said trial court did issue a supersedeas, and thereby did stay said judgment, sentence, and all the force and effect thereof, which appeal is still undetermined and pending." Upon the trial an authenticated transcript of the record of conviction alleged in the accusation was offered in evidence, to which the following objections were made: (1) It is irrelevant to the issues, incompetent, and does not purport to be all the proceedings; (2) the record of such proceedings cannot be proved by an authenticated copy in this criminal action, but must be proved by common-law evidence. These objections were overruled, and the following admission entered of record: "It is admitted that on or about June 25, 1897, the accused sued out a writ of error, in the case of the United States against him, to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that thereupon Hon. John E. Carland, judge of the United States district court, granted a supersedeas therein." No other evidence was offered or received.

So far as it is applicable to this proceeding, Comp. Laws, § 478, reads thus: "The following are sufficient causes for revocation or suspension: (1) When he [an attorney] has been convicted of a felony, or of a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, in either of which cases, the record of conviction is conclusive evidence." It is contended that this section was repealed by chapter 21, Laws 1898. Comp. Laws, §§ 462-480, inclusive, were formerly chapter 18 of the Political Code, the subject of such chapter being "Attorneys and Counselors at Law." They provide what persons may practice, how they shall be admitted, and the oath to be taken; define the duties and powers of attorneys; create and regulate an attorney's lien; prohibit any attorney from being a surety in any suit instituted in this state; provide for suspending and revoking his license, designate certain causes as sufficient for so doing; and prescribe the procedure in such cases. The act of 1893 provides who shall practise, and how persons shall be admitted; prescribes the same oath, with certain verbal modifications required by the change from a territorial condition to that of statehood; provides for suspension and disbarment, and the procedure, "when an affidavit charging an attorney with embezzlement, or other professional misconduct, is filed in the circuit or supreme court." It expressly repeals all acts and parts of acts in conflict with itself. Evidently, it was not intended that this act should replace all of chapter 18 of the Political Code. The later law cannot be regarded as a revision of the entire subject. It would be unreasonable to infer that the legislature would repeal the sections defining the duties, powers, and liens of lawyers, without enacting something to take their place. As indicated by its language, the legislature clearly intended to repeal such parts of the then existing statute "as are in conflict with the act," and only such. The later law provides that this court shall have power to strike the name of any attorney or counselor from its roll, and to revoke his license, or to suspend him from practice for such time as shall seem just, "for cause shown." Laws 1893, chap. 21, § 8. Is it in conflict with this provision to declare that conviction of a felony or of a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude is a sufficient cause for revocation or suspension? Certainly not. Section 9 of the act is as follows: "When an affidavit charging an attorney with embezzlement, or other professional misconduct, is filed in the circuit or supreme court, it shall order such attorney to show cause why he should not be suspended or disbarred from practice and on the return of such order, the hearing of all matters pertaining thereto shall be referred to a committee of three reputable attorneys and counselors of the supreme court, and judgment shall be rendered on its report." Whether or not this section prescribes the procedure in all disbarment or suspension proceedings will not be decided, because it is not involved in the case at bar. Whatever may be the conclusion when that question is presented, it cannot be successfully contended that the section was intended to limit the powers of the courts to the causes mentioned therein. In construing any statute, it is the duty of the court to consider the entire enactment, and, if possible, give effect to all parts of it. Assuming, without deciding, that, as contended for by the accused, where the legislature has specified certain causes for disbarment or suspension, they are exclusive, if § 9 was intended to embrace all such causes, § 8 should empower this court to revoke or suspend when it has been shown that an attorney has been guilty of "embezzlement or other professional misconduct." Were it shown that an attorney has been convicted of robbery, there would certainly be "cause shown" for revoking his license, yet he would not be guilty of "embezzlement or other professional misconduct." This court has frequently held that repeals by implication are not favored. The conclusion is irresistible that Comp. Laws, § 473, has not been repealed.

The contention that the crime of which accused was convicted is neither a felony nor a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, within the meaning of § 473, is untenable. "Felony," as therein employed, must be given the definition given the word by the territorial legislature: "A crime which is or may be punishable with death or by imprisonment in the territorial prison." Comp. Laws, § 6204. It means, in ordinary language, a penitentiary offense. This view is consonant with sound reason. Courts should not be required to recognize as attorneys persons who are confined in state prisons. Again, the accused has been convicted of a crime involving "moral turpitude." "Everything done contrary to justice, honesty, modesty, or good morals is said to be done with turpitude." 2 Bouvier, Law Dict. 759. If it is not dishonest and contrary to good morals to receive property of another and convert it to one's own use and gain, knowing it to have been stolen, we are at a loss to know of what honesty and good morals consist.

The objections to the introduction of the record of the Federal court were properly overruled. The material allegations of the accusation are, in effect, admitted by the answer; the transcript is properly authenticated; it contains all the proceedings necessary to sustain the accusation; the writ of error and supersedeas are matters of defense that the accused should have been prepared to prove, and this is not a criminal action. Concerning the character of such proceedings, the authorities are conflicting. The Supreme Court of the United States, in a case wherein the subject is exhaustively discussed, and numerous authorities are cited, reaches what we regard as the correct conclusion. The following language of that learned court is quoted with approval: "The proceeding is, in its nature, civil, and collateral to any criminal prosecution by indictment. The proceeding is not for the purpose of punishment, but for the purpose of preserving the courts of justice from the official ministration of persons unfit to practice in them. Undoubtedly the power is one that ought always to be exercised with great caution, and ought never to be exercised except in clear cases of misconduct, which affect the standing and character of the party as an attorney. But when such a case is shown to exist, the courts ought not to hesitate, from sympathy with the individual, to protect themselves from scandal and contempt, and the public from prejudice, by removing grossly improper persons from participation in the administration of the laws. The power to do this is a rightful one; and, when exercised in proper cases, is no violation of any constitutional provision." Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 288, 27 L. ed. 562. In this jurisdiction it has long been the practice to review civil actions on appeal, and criminal actions by writ of error. Under chapter 18, Pol. Code, proceedings to suspend or disbar in the district court were taken to the supreme court on appeal; and under chapter 21, Laws 1893, proceedings to suspend are subject to appeal to this court. Comp. Laws, § 477; Laws 1893, chap. 21, § 8. While not conclusive, this legislation indicates that the territorial and state legislatures regarded such proceedings as being of a civil nature. If the proceeding is of a civil nature, it was competent for the legislature to provide that a record of conviction shall be evidence therein. As accused did not offer to contradict the record by other evidence it is unnecessary to decide whether it should be regarded as conclusive.

Finally, it is contended that by reason of the writ of error and supersedeas the judgment of the Federal court is ineffectual for any purpose, and will not warrant disbarment or suspension until it shall have been affirmed. In discussing this proposition, it will be assumed that the Supreme Court of the United States acquired jurisdiction of the criminal action, and that such action is now pending therein. Regarding civil actions, it is held in numerous cases that the perfecting of an appeal suspends the operation of a judgment as an estoppel, and renders it no longer admissible as evidence in any controversy between the parties. There are other equally respectable authorities which support the doctrine that an appeal, with proper bond to stay proceedings, merely suspends the right to execution, but leaves the judgment, until annulled or reversed, binding upon the parties, as to every question directly decided. Freeman, Judgm. § 328; Willard v. Ostrander, 51 Kan. 481. In California, under a statute identically the same as that in this state, which provides that "an action is deemed to be pending from the time of its commencement until its final determination upon appeal or until the time of appeal has passed, unless the judgment be sooner satisfied," it is held that a judgment is not final until the time of appeal has expired, and until then it is no evidence of the facts thereby adjudged. Comp. Laws, § 5348; Re Blythe, 99 Cal. 472. But it will be observed that this decision relates to judgments in civil actions. We are dealing with the effect of a judgment in a criminal action upon the rights of the defendant therein to practice law after conviction, while such action is pending in an appellate court upon writ of error. If affirmed, the original judgment will be enforced. Execution is suspended by the supersedeas, but the judgment remains until reversed or modified, and it is clearly competent for the legislature to declare what effect it shall have from the time it is rendered. Should this court follow the decisions in California, and hold that, because of the statute quoted, judgments in civil actions, pending upon appeal, are not evidence of the facts thereby adjudged, it would do so because the legislature has established that rule of evidence; and it would be the duty of the court to ascertain from the statute what rule has been in like manner established for the trial of proceedings to disbar or suspend attorneys. Its language is as follows: "When he has been convicted . . . the record of conviction is conclusive evidence." Comp. Laws, § 473. The question of guilt is not involved. Conviction is cause for disbarment or suspension. The fact of conviction is alone in issue, and the record, the legislature declares, shall be conclusive evidence of that fact. The material inquiry is simply this: Has the accused been convicted? The term "conviction," in its most common use, signifies the finding of the jury that the prisoner is guilty, but we think it is used in the statute under discussion as implying the judgment of a court upon a conviction or confession of guilt. Com. v. Gorham, 99 Mass. 420. Then the fact of conviction has been established in this proceeding in the manner prescribed by the statute. The existence of that fact is sufficient cause for suspension or disbarment. In a proceeding like the one at bar, under statutes substantially the same as those in this state, the supreme court of California holds that while the criminal action is pending upon appeal there is no judgment capable of being carried into effect, that it is within the range of possibilities that the judgment may be reversed, and that "there is not such a final conviction against the defendant as the law contemplates, to justify his removal." People v. Treadwell, 66 Cal. 400.

With all due respect to that learned court, we must decline to follow its decision in this case. Its conclusion seems to be based upon the clearly-erroneous assumption that the judgment in the criminal action will be reversed, and it interpolates into the statute the word "final." If the court had jurisdiction to try the criminal action, the presumption is that its judgment is right and will not be reversed. Beyond this, we think that the California court fails to observe the real issue of fact involved in the proceeding before it. As heretofore suggested, the issue was not whether the defendant was guilty of the crime charged in the criminal action, but, was he convicted? That court might possibly say that the judgment was not evidence of the fact of defendant's guilt, but it could not say it was not evidence of the fact that he had been convicted.

Sufficient cause having been shown for the suspension or disbarment of the accused, it is the conclusion of the court that his name should be stricken from the roll of attorneys and counselors at law, and his license to practice in all the courts of this state should be revoked. Judgment should be entered in accordance with this decision.

A petition for rehearing having been presented, Haney, J., on January 22, 1898, handed down the following response:

Heretofore a decision was rendered herein disbarring the accused because of his conviction in the United States district court. Re Kirby (S. D.) . . . He now appeals from the clerk's taxation of costs in favor of the accusers, and petitions for a rehearing. In Kirby v. McCook County Circuit Ct. (S. D.) 72 N. W. 461, this court clearly indicated the practice where a judgment has been rendered for costs and the opposite party claims none should have been awarded. In such cases the party aggrieved should move to have the judgment itself modified and not appeal from the taxation on the ground that no costs should be taxed. For this reason the action of the clerk should be affirmed. Beyond this the judgment in favor of the accusers is right as they are the persons who instituted the proceeding and are entitled to recover such disbursements as they have made, and as are provided for in the statute. Comp. Laws, § 5189. All the items allowed by the clerk being justified by the section cited the taxation in this proceeding in all respects is confirmed.

In support of the contention that the court erred in holding that a conviction was had within the meaning of Comp. Laws, § 473, notwithstanding the writ of error and supersedeas, accused insists that where conviction for crime constitutes a cause for divorce one cannot be obtained for this cause while the criminal action is pending on appeal. It needs no argument to show the essential difference between the consequences of divorce and disbarment, but assuming that there is no distinction in principle, there is such conflict in the authorities regarding the meaning of conviction as a cause for divorce, that were that question before the court, it would be justified in taking the view deemed most consonant with sound reason. In Iowa, divorce cannot be obtained for this cause while the criminal action is pending on appeal. Vinsant v. Vinsant, 49 Iowa, 689; Rivers v. Rivers, 60 Iowa, 378, 65 Iowa, 568. A different doctrine prevails in Massachusetts and New Hampshire; Cone v.

Cone, 58 N. H. 152; Handy v. Handy, 124 Mass. 894. Under a statute providing that a sentence of imprisonment for life shall dissolve the marriage of the person sentenced, without any judgment of divorce or other legal process, it was recently held, in Wisconsin, that such a sentence operated to dissolve the marriage when rendered, although it was subsequently reversed for error on appeal. State v. Duket, 90 Wis. 272, 81 L. R. A. 515.

In support of the contention that conviction in the Federal court is not a cause for disbarment in the state court attention is again called to the statement that Thomas Addis Emmett, a brother of the famous Robert Emmett, was admitted to practice by the New York court of appeals and the Supreme Court of the United States, after conviction of treason in England and sentence of death which was later commuted to banishment from British soil. Conceding its historic accuracy, the relevancy of this statement is not apparent, as it does not appear that Emmett's conviction was considered by either of the courts which admitted him to practice.

If accused is, in fact, innocent of the crime of which he was convicted, his situation is indeed unfortunate; if he is, in fact, guilty, it is equally if not more unfortunate; but in neither event is this court responsible for his conviction or conduct; and, if it shall ever appear that he was, in fact, not guilty of the crime charged, no court will, in the absence of other valid objections, decline to restore his rights as an attorney and counselor at law. All the matters mentioned in the petition for a rehearing which merit attention have been carefully considered with the result that the court is compelled to adhere to the views expressed in its former decision, and the petition is denied.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Kansas
v.

A. D. HUBBARD, Appt.

(58 Kan. 797.)

Receivers are not agents, within the meaning of § 88 of the crimes act, and are not subject to prosecution under the latter part of that section, which provides, in effect, that if any agent shall neglect or refuse to deliver to his employer, on demand, money or property which comes into his possession by virtue of such employment, office, or trust, after deducting lawful fees and charges, unless the same has been lost by means beyond his control, or his employers have permitted him to use the same, shall, upon conviction, be punished as for embezzlement.

(Johnston, J., dissents.)

(December 11, 1897.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Shawnee County convicting him of embezzlement. Reversed.

*Headnote by JOHNSTON, J.

NOTE.—On the general question of a receiver's relation to the court, see cases in note to Humphreys v. Hopkins (Cal.) 6 L. R. A. 792.

Statement by Johnston, J.:

This was a prosecution for embezzlement. In the information it was alleged, in substance, that in a certain proceeding pending in the district court of Shawnee county, wherein E. H. Snow was plaintiff, and the Hamilton Printing Company and others were defendants, A. D. Hubbard was appointed as receiver by the district court, and that after qualification he took possession of the printing plant of the Hamilton Printing Company, and the business and property involved in the litigation, carried on an extensive business, sold property, and collected moneys of the aggregate amount of $40,000, which were to be paid out in accordance with the direction of the court; "and being in the possession of said money and property as such agent and receiver, as aforesaid, said A. D. Hubbard did then and there designedly, fraudulently, unlawfully, and feloniously, and with the intent to cheat and defraud the said partnership of the Hamilton Printing Company, and the Hamilton Printing Company, a corporation, their creditors and stockholders, and to convert the same to his own use, neglect and refuse to turn over and deliver to the clerk of the dis-strict court of Shawnee county, Kansas, the sum of $7,056.78, the money which came into the possession of said A. D. Hubbard by virtue of his employment and trust as aforesaid, and remained in his possession after deducting his reasonable and lawful fees, charges, and commission for his services as such agent and receiver, as aforesaid, though an order of said district court for the payment thereof of said $7,056.78 was duly and legally made and served on said defendant A. D. Hubbard, and demand had been duly and legally made on him (said A. D. Hubbard) for said $7,056.78, said money, as aforesaid, due and unaccounted for by him; that said $7,056.78, had not been lost by any means beyond the control of him (the said A. D. Hubbard) before he had an opportunity to make delivery thereof to his employers; and that his said employers did not permit him (the said A. D. Hubbard) to use said $7,056.78, and which said money, of the value of $7,056.78, lawful money of the United States of America, the precise character, kind, and denomination thereof being unknown to this informant, and for that reason not herein given, said A. D. Hubbard did then and there, and in the manner and by the means aforesaid, designedly, fraudulently, unlawfully, and feloniously take, steal, embezzle, and convert to his own use, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of Kansas." The defendant moved the court to quash the information, for the reason that the same was insufficient to charge the defendant with the commission of a public offense, and, on the trial, objected to the introduction of evidence for the same reason. The motion to quash and the objection to evidence were overruled, and upon the trial the jury found the defendant guilty as charged. A motion in arrest of judgment and a motion for a new trial were overruled, and the defendant was sentenced to the state penitentiary at hard labor for the term of three years.

From that sentence he appealed to this court.

Messrs. P. H. Forbes and E. G. Wilson, for appellant:

The statute does not mention receivers, although, in order to hold clerks, servants, administrators, executors, trustees of express trusts, guardians, etc., it was deemed necessary to describe them as such.

Adhering to the rule that words must be given their ordinary meaning in the construction of a criminal statute, the punishment of a receiver is impossible under our statute unless it is proper to hold that a receiver is an agent in the sense in which the word "agent" is used in the statute referred to, and under which this prosecution is instituted.

State v. Smith, 18 Kan. 274; State v. Bancroft, 22 Kan. 202; Patrick v. Ellis, 30 Kan. 686.

A receiver may be most comprehensively described as a person standing indifferent between the parties (this does not describe an agent) who is appointed by the court (this does not describe an agent) under its equitable or statutory jurisdiction, as a quasi officer or representative of the court, to take the charge and management of the property in controversy, under the direction of the court, during the continuance of the litigation or in pursuance thereof.

20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 11; Booth v. Clark, 58 U. S. 17 How. 881, 15 L. ed. 524; Kaiser v. Kellar, 21 Iowa, 96; Hooper v. Winston, 24 Ill. 358.

In no case that we have been able to find in the decisions of the several states of the Union, after a very careful investigation, can we discover that a receiver appointed by a court was ever prosecuted for embezzlement.

Messrs. L. C. Boyle, Attorney General, and A. P. Jetmore, for the State:

The fact that a receiver furnishes a bond, or may be cited for contempt, is no reason for presuming that the law exempts, or the legislature intended to except, this class of agents or officers from the operation of this statute.

State v. Smith, 18 Kan. 293.

Section 88 was intended to cover every other class of agents on whom a demand is necessary, before even liable civilly, and the language was purposely made general, to include all such agents, for whomsoever they were acting.

State v. Bancroft, 22 Kan. 170; State v. Yeiter, 54 Kan. 277; State v. Smith, 18 Kan. 294.

Although a receiver holds the property for the benefit of the party ultimately entitled to it, yet when such party is ascertained the receiver is considered as his receiver.

Edwards, Receivers, p. 3; 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 158; State v. Lillie, 21 Kan. 728; State v. Spaulding, 24 Kan. 1.

Johnston, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal question presented for determination is whether a receiver who unlawfully appropriates money which comes into his hands as receiver, or fails to account for and pay over the same upon demand, is subject to prosecution and punishment as for embezzlement. The defendant was prosecuted upon the theory that he was an agent, and under that portion of ¶ 2220 of Gen. Stat. 1889, which provides that "If any agent shall neglect or refuse to deliver to his employer or employers, on demand, any money, bank bills, treasury notes, promissory notes, evidences of debt, or other property which may or shall have come into his possession by virtue of such employment, office, or trust, after deducting his reasonable or lawful fees, charges, or commissions for his services, unless the same shall have been lost by means beyond his control, before he had opportunity to make delivery thereof to his employer or employers, or the employer or employers have permitted him to use the same, he shall upon conviction thereof be punished in the manner provided in this section for unlawfully converting such money or other property to his own use."

Is a receiver an "agent," within the meaning of the quoted section? The contention of the defendant is that the relation of agency, as ordinarily understood, does not exist between a receiver and the court which appoints him or the parties for whom he acts. A majority of the courts agree with this contention, and are of opinion that a receiver is not an agent, within the meaning of the statute. It is held that, in construing a criminal statute, words must be given their ordinary meaning, unless it is clear that another was intended, and that to place receivers in a class with agents requires an unusual and strained construction of the statutory language. It does not appear that receivers have ever been designated as agents in our statutes or in the decisions of the court, and, as an evidence that they were not within legislative contemplation, attention is called to the fact that in the first part of the section mention is made of executors, administrators, guardians, and others, vested with official functions somewhat similar to those exercised by receivers, but no mention is made of receivers. It is argued that, if the legislature had intended to make receivers subject to the penalties of that statute, they would have been specifically enumerated with the others of the same general class. The gist of the offense prescribed by the statute is neglect or refusal of an agent "to deliver to his employer or employers on demand any money," etc., and it is said that this statute manifestly contemplates that the agent mentioned shall have an employer. Can it be said that the court is the employer of the receiver, or that he is employed by the parties to the action wherein the receiver is appointed? The court does not pay the receiver, and is not an employer, as the term is ordinarily understood. So, it is said that the parties litigant cannot be said to have employed him, because they did not consent to his appointment, and he does not act under their orders or directions. A receiver is generally regarded as an officer of the court, and subject to its orders and directions. The property or money which comes into his hands as such officer is regarded as being in custodia legis, to be delivered or paid over to those who may establish a right to the same. He stands in an indifferent attitude, not representing the plaintiff or the defendant, but really representing the court, and acting under its direction, for the benefit of all the parties in interest. He has no powers other than those conferred by his appointment, and, being but the hand or arm of the court itself, the conclusion is that he does not stand in the relation of agent to the court or to the parties in litigation. The writer is unable to reach this conclusion. The term "agent" is one of wide application, and, as used in the statute, it seems to fairly include receivers. "Agency is the relation, created either by express or implied contract, or by law, whereby one party vis juris, called the principal, constituent, or employer, delegates the transaction of some lawful business, with more or less discretionary power, to another party, called the agent, attorney, proxy, or delegate, who undertakes to manage the affair and render to him an account thereof." 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 937. Webster defines an "agent" as "one who acts for or in the place of another, by authority from him." To constitute agency in its broader sense, it is not essential that it should be created by agreement or contract; it may arise under the law, and anyone who represents another or undertakes to do something for him and on his authority is properly designated as an "agent."

To the mind of the writer the term "agent" was not used in the statute in a limited sense. Instead of using restrictive language, expressions denoting the widest application are employed. For instance, the word "any agent" are used; and, in treating of the money or property for which he must account it speaks of that which comes into his possession by virtue of "such employment, office, or trust." The words last quoted certainly broaden the meaning of the term "agent" and indicate that the legislature did not intend to confine it to agencies arising under a mere contract, but rather that it should extend to agencies possessing the trust or official character as well. In State v. Bancroft, 22 Kan. 170, it was contended that the word "agent" was used in a limited sense; and it was there held that, "if the legislature had intended to limit this provision to the agents previously enumerated, it would naturally have said 'any such agent,' and that, failing to use that or some similar term, and in fact using the comprehensive expression 'any agent,' it intended to include every agent." In State v. Spaulding, 24 Kan. 1, the city clerk, who was prosecuted for the embezzlement of license fees, and which had not been paid to the city treasurer, contended that he was not the agent of the city, within the meaning of the law, and it was held that, when one assumes to act as the agent of another, he may not, when challenged, deny his agency, and "that one who is agent enough to receive money, is agent enough to be punished for embezzling it." In another embezzlement case, against a county treasurer, it was contended that he had no employer, in the sense in which that term was used in the statute; but the court gave no ear to the contention, and held that, although he was an officer, the public might be regarded as his employer, and that he was therefore subject to prosecution for the embezzlement of the public funds. State v. Smith, 13 Kan. 274, 294.

While a receiver is an officer of the court, and acts under its orders and instructions, his relation to the court and to the parties in litigation is that of agency. He represents the court and the parties, and acts for them all in the transaction of the business for which he was appointed. The defendant here was intrusted with the property and business of the state printing establishment and, as receiver, he had business transactions with hundreds of persons and corporations in and out of the state. In dealing with those parties, he represented the court and those who owned an interest in the printing plant and business. They may be properly regarded as the principal or principals, and he as the agent, representing them, and transacting the business under the authority and direction of the court. In 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 158, it is said that "the relation of a receiver to the court appointing him is one of agency;" and so it would appear that, when the statute employs language indicating that the term "agent" is to be applied in its wider sense, it should be held to include receivers. See also Ellis v. Little, 27 Kan. 707, 41 Am. Rep. 434. It can hardly be that the legislature, which apparently was endeavoring to reach everyone guilty of embezzlement, intended to exempt a class of persons intrusted with property and funds so numerous as receivers; and, unless they are held liable within the provisions of this statute, they cannot be punished for embezzlement. As a majority of the court are of opinion that they are not included within the terms of the statute, it must be held that the court erred in overruling the motion to quash the information.

The judgment of the District Court will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to discharge the defendant.

Doster, Ch. J., concurs. Johnston, J., dissents.

Allen, J., concurring specially:

It is apparent that the information was framed to charge the defendant with embezzlement under the last part of ¶ 2220, which relates to agents only, and that the case was tried on the theory that he was so charged. That a receiver is not an agent having an employer to whom he is bound to account and pay over the money received, within the usual meaning of the words, seems to me reasonably clear. Whether a receiver might be charged and convicted of embezzlement under the first part of the paragraph is a question concerning which I am unable to find a satisfactory answer. Receivers are not named, nor do they fall strictly within any class of persons mentioned in this section; yet it would seem to be in the nature of things the same offense for a receiver to convert to his own use trust funds in his hands as for any person belonging to either of the classes mentioned to convert like funds in his hands.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

T. J. STILLWELL, Appt.,

v.

Stephen DUNCAN.

(.....Ky.)

1. The plea of liberum tenementum is available in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit brought by a person who was in actual possession of the land.
2. One who enters upon his own land, and tears down a fence which has been built to inclose it by a person who wrongfully took possession of it, is not liable to an action for trespass by the latter.
3. A counterclaim for damages to the freehold may be set up as connected with the subject of the action when the defendant in trespass quare clausum asserts title to the land.
4. The amount in controversy is not material to the jurisdiction of the court of appeals of Kentucky when the title to land is involved.

(January 26, 1896.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Nelson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for trespass on real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. T. Atkinson for appellant.

Du Relle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee brought suit against appellant for trespass quare clausum fregit, alleging that he (Duncan) was in possession of a tract of land of about an acre, and that on March 20, 1895, appellant wrongfully entered upon said land, and cut down and carried away trees growing thereon, tore down fencing, dug holes, and placed other fencing and timber, and turned cattle thereon. Appellant answered, denying the wrongful entry, and in the second paragraph as amended, stated that he was the owner and entitled to the possession; averring facts showing title by continuous possession, under record deducible from the commonwealth, for twenty-three years prior to March, 1892, when he averred that appellee forcibly and without right entered on the land, and evicted him, tore down the inclosing fence, and erected a new fence between the tract and the remainder of appellant's land; that on the 1st of March, 1895, appellant recovered judgment against appellee, Duncan, for the trespass referred to and the injury committed by him, up to the date of filing the first action of trespass; that thereafter, about March 20, 1895, appellant peaceably re-entered the tract, took down the separating fence, and erected a new fence within the boundary, connecting the tract with his other land. He also filed a counterclaim for the damage to the land during appellee's possession thereof, from the date of the filing of his former action of trespass down to the date of his re-entry upon the land. A demurrer to this paragraph as amended was sustained, presumably upon the ground that the plea of liberum tenementum is not available to an action of trespass quare clausum fregit brought by a person who was in actual possession of the land. Such, however, is not the law, as we understand it. In McClain v. Todd, 5 J. J. Marsh. 338, 22 Am. Dec. 37, it was held that "an intruder does not gain such a possession as will even authorize him to maintain trespass quare clausum fregit." Bacon, Abr." In Tribble v. Frame, 7 J. J. Marsh. 601, 23 Am. Dec. 439, the appellant, holding a paramount title, and having a perfect legal right to enter upon the land, entered thereon in the absence of the appellee, who had theretofore been in actual possession; and this court (Chief Justice Robertson delivering the opinion) thus laid down the law upon the question presented by the case at bar: "According to the common law, a person holding the title to land, and having the right of entry, might use actual force, if necessary, for overcoming any forcible resistance; because, his right of entry being perfect, no other person could lawfully resist him in the exercise of his perfect right. The British statutes of forcible entry and detainer declared that an entry with actual force should subject the party so entering to an indictment for any consequential breach of the public peace, and to restitution of possession, and also to an action of trespass. But these statutes have ever been so construed as not to affect the common-law right of justifying, in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, the forcible entry, by pleading and proving a right of entry; and hence, liberum tenementum has, notwithstanding those statutes, been always held to be an effectual plea to the action of trespass, and thus proves that the right of entry is a right to make an actual entry on the land. Bacon, Abr. title Forcible Entry and Detainer, A; 3 Jacobs, Law Dict. 88; 3 Chitty, Pl. 4 and 5, note, 12; Id. 179, and notes; Selwyn, N. P."

NOTE.—For rights of owner of land as to regaining possession, see also Page v. Dwight (Mass.) ante, 418; Vinson v. Flynn (Ark.) ante, 415; Smith v. Detroit Loan & Bldg. Asso. (Mich.) ante, 410.

In Yeates v. Allin, 2 Dana, 184, the exact question arose which is presented in the case at bar. Yeates, having the legal right to the possession, entered, without actual force, a room of a house in which Allin was living, and, to an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, pleaded a judgment in favor of himself and others for seven undivided eighths of the land in the actual possession of Allin. The lower court instructed the jury that although Yeates had the right of entry, and that right was confirmed by the judgment pleaded, yet he had no right to enter without Allin's consent, unless put in possession by writ of habere facias, and that, if he did so enter, he was a trespasser. In delivering the opinion, Chief Justice Robertson said: "The law is altogether different from what the instruction assumed it to be. Libertum tenementum is, just as it was at common law, a good plea in bar to an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. To say that a person has a legal right of entry, but that he has no legal right to enter without the occupant's consent, or unless the occupant shall have surrendered the possession, or left it derelict, would be inconsistent and unmeaning. The legal right of entry, like every other perfect legal right, is independent of the will of others; for, if it be not so, it cannot be claimed or asserted as a matter of right, but must be invoked as a favor, and is therefore no legal right. A person having a right to enter on his own land cannot be guilty of trespass on the land, or anything pertaining to it, by entering, whether with or without the consent of another, who has no lawful right to prevent the entry. Tribble v. Frame, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 187, and Tribble v. Frame, 7 J. J. Marsh. 603, 28 Am. Dec. 489." And see Latta v. Redden, 5 Ky. L. Rep. 426; Illinois & St. L. R. & C. Co. v. Cobb, 94 Ill. 55; Bacon, Abr. title 39 L. R. A.

Trespass, C, 8; Hyatt v. Wood, 4 Johns. 150, 4 Am. Dec. 258. We conclude that the action of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer to the plea of liberum tenementum was manifest error.

As to the counterclaim for damages for injury to the freehold between the date of the bringing of the original action of trespass by appellant and the date of his re-entry, the action of the lower court was, in our opinion, incorrect. The counterclaim was not based on a cause of action arising out of the transaction stated in the petition, but was based on a cause of action connected with the subject of the action. In Whitlock v. Ledford, 82 Ky. 391, the plaintiff had brought an action for trespass to land, averring title in himself; and the defendant answered, denying plaintiff's title, alleging title in himself, and seeking, by way of counterclaim, to recover of plaintiff the whole tract of land in controversy. The court (Chief Justice Hines delivering the opinion) said: "The subject of the action is the land in controversy, and the foundation of plaintiff's claim is the asserted legal title to the land. The fact that the plaintiff seeks to recover damages for trespass does not alter the character of the action from a direct proceeding to recover the land on the allegation of title, and in such a case there could be no doubt of the defendant's right to assert title in himself, and have it so adjudged. The counterclaim asserted is clearly connected with the subject of the action." That case is hardly distinguishable from the case at bar. In this case no title, but merely the bare possession, was averred by the plaintiff, and the counterclaim for damages did not arise out of the transaction stated in the petition. But the cause of action stated in the counterclaim is connected with the subject of the action for the plaintiff's right of recovery depends on the question whether the defendant has title to the land, upon which question also depends the right of defendant to recover on his counterclaim. If defendant has title, plaintiff cannot recover, for defendant's entry was in that case not wrongful, as averred in the petition. The subject of the original action, therefore, involves the question whether defendant has title, and upon that question defendant's counterclaim is based. Under the view herein taken, it is unnecessary to consider the instructions given by the trial court.

While the amount of recovery by appellee was but $2.50, this court has jurisdiction of the appeal, as by the answer, pleading title and right to possession in appellant, the question of title to the land became involved. Clements v. Waters, 90 Ky. 99; Hughes v. Swope, 88 Ky. 257; Moore v. Boner, 7 Bush, 28; Caskey v. Lewis, 15 B. Mon. 29.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

RÉSUMÉ OF THE DECISIONS PUBLISHED IN THIS BOOK.

SHOWING the Changes, Progress, and Development of the Law during the Third Quarter of the Judicial Year Beginning with October 1, 1897, Classified as Follows:

- I. PUBLIC, OFFICIAL, AND STATUTORY MATTERS.
- II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.
- III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.
- IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS; PERSONAL CAPACITY.
- V. FIDUCIARIES.
- VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES.
- VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS; WILLS; LIENS; DEED.
- VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES.
- IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE; HOLIDAY.

I. PUBLIC, OFFICIAL, AND STATUTORY MATTERS.

Statutes.

The omission from the legislative journal of an entry of the yeas and nays on the second and third readings of a bill to impose a tax is held fatal to the validity of the act, where the Constitution expressly requires such entry in case of such a bill. (N. C.) 489.

Courts.

A statute attempting to give the court power to assign or transfer a town or city from one class to another is held to violate a constitutional requirement that the legislature should make such assignment or transfer, without providing for delegating the power. (Ky.) 214.

The approval and adoption or modification of a plan for a street railway is held not to be within the scope of judicial power. (Conn.) 794.

Court-house.

The assignment of rooms in a court house to the different judges of the courts of record is held to be a matter for them to arrange among themselves, and not to be included in the power of the county board to provide a court-house and proper rooms and offices for the accommodation of the courts. (Ill.) 197.

Attorneys.

The effect of a conviction of felony as a ground for disbarring an attorney is held not to be annulled by a writ of error and superseas. (S. D.) 856.

Officers.

The words "deputy postmaster" in the Indiana Constitution, excepting such an officer if his salary did not exceed more than $90 per annum from the provision as to holding more than one lucrative office at the same time, are held to mean postmaster. (Ind.) 278.

Schools.

Power to compel school children to be vaccinated as a condition of attendance is denied, under the general authority to make rules and regulations. (Ill.) 152.

The dismissal of a school superintendent is held to be justified by the fact that he was under indictment for adultery, and especially after a verdict of guilty has been found, although afterwards the verdict is set aside and the prosecution dismissed. (Mass.) 510.

The right of women to vote at a school meeting for director of a district is sustained, although the Constitution provides that only male citizens shall vote at all elections, but has another provision giving the legislature power to provide a system of schools. (Or.) 768.

Casting vote.

The right of an auditor to give a casting vote on a tie vote by township trustees for county superintendent is held not to be limited to a vote by ballot, but to extend to a preliminary motion or resolution, or a motion to appoint. (Ind.) 282.

Counties.

A statute making a county a municipal corporation is held not to change the prior rule of law under which a county was not held liable for negligence in the maintenance of a bridge which the state requires it to maintain. (N. Y.) 46.

The nonliability of counties for negligence is illustrated in case of injury to an employee at a county insane asylum from a defective machine. (N. Y.) 88.

The broad doctrine that counties are no more liable than the state for acts or omissions of officers is laid down in a case which denies the liability of a county for negligence of officers in respect to the repair of bridges. (Ind.) 58.

But liability of a county for unauthorized and unlawful acts of its officials done colore officii is sustained, where the county adopts the acts and retains the benefits thereof, notwithstanding the general rule that a municipality is not liable for such acts of its officers. (Minn.) 75.

A county exhibit at an interstate exposition, and the erection and maintenance of suitable buildings therefor, when authorized by statute, are sustained as for a valid public purpose. (Neb.) 518.

Municipalities.

The right of a city to remove the turnout of a street railway as an obstruction, without notice or hearing, is denied, and legal measures are held necessary. (N. J.) 609.

Bonds payable only in gold coin are held within the power of a city to issue, under a statute authorizing them to be made payable "in gold coin or lawful money," as this is construed to give an option. (Cal.) 444.

A statute reducing the power of a city to levy taxes to pay judgments is held not unconstitutional as depriving the owner of the judgment of property without due process of law, or impairing the obligation of a contract, if the judgment was for a tort. (Tex.) 259.

The right of a city to lease its gas works is sustained, against the contention that the city was under obligation to continue their operation as municipal duty. (Pa.) 887.

Delegation of the power to fix the amount of tax for a public library which must be levied by the common council, to a board which is not chosen by and directly responsible to the people, is held to be beyond the power of the legislature, unless the people consent. (Iowa) 285.

Ordinances.

An ordinance prohibiting an awning over a sidewalk unless it is on a suitable frame is held void for uncertainty. (Conn.) 670.

An ordinance prohibiting dogs from running at large, and providing that in case of its violation the dogs may be seized, and, if not ransomed by payment of $1 before 10 o'clock on the morning after they have been detained for twenty-four hours, shall be killed, and also providing for notice to the owner if his name is on the dog's collar, is held constitutional. (Md.) 649.

Discrimination between residents and non-residents of a town or city in respect to penalties for allowing stock to run at large in the streets, by exempting the nonresidents partially or entirely, is held constitutional. (N. C.) 245.

An ordinance requiring a street railway company to sprinkle streets through which its cars run is held unreasonable and void,—at least when it does not limit the time to the track; and it is also held void for indefiniteness when it does not specify the extent, mode, or frequency of the sprinkling. (La.) 618.

An ordinance for the prevention of cruelty to animals is held to be within the power to prohibit nuisances. (La.) 520.

An ordinance declaring the emission of dense black or thick gray smoke a nuisance, without any limitation as to the time of emission, or any inquiry as to whether it is a nuisance in fact or not, is held void. (Mo.) 551.

An ordinance for paving with asphaltum from Pitch lake in the island of Trinidad is held void, because it creates a monopoly, where that lake is the property of a private corporation. (Ill.) 482.

The inalienable right to procure food is held violated by an ordinance prohibiting the sale of fresh pork or sausage made therefrom between June 1 and October. (Ark.) 266.

Fisheries.

The right of the state to protect fish is held to extend to streams running through private lands when connected with the public fishing grounds. (Cal.) 581.

Interstate commerce.

A statute providing for the inspection of all sheep brought into the state, and the dipping of them, whether healthy or not, while exempting some of the sheep in the state therefrom during certain periods of the year, is held to be an unconstitutional burden on interstate commerce as well as a deprivation of equal privileges and immunities of citizens. (Idaho) 365.

Pilots.

Placing 25 tons of coal as ballast in the hold of a vessel of 700 or 800 tons' burden, which is loaded with lumber, is held insufficient to bring her within the provisions of a statute exempting vessels loaded in whole or in part with coal or coke mined in the United States from pilot fees. (C. C. App. 4th C.) 177.

Taxes.

A succession tax is held to be a tax on the right to receive property, and not on the property itself, and an exemption of estate less than $7,500 is sustained. (Mont.) 170.

The cost of reproduction is held to be the proper basis for local taxation of a railroad under a system which requires the franchise and personal property to be assessed by state officers. (N. Y.) 237.

A statute requiring taxes on personal property unsecured by lien on real estate to be collected at the time of assessment, though before equalization or the beginning of the year for which they are to be paid, but providing for subsequent correction of the amount, is held valid, and the discrimination justified by the difference in the situation between the different kinds of property. (Cal.) 342.

The right to tax a herd of sheep driven through the state is held to depend on the existence of a purpose to obtain grazing for them, not as a necessary incident of the travel merely, but as an additional motive for the movement. (Wyo.) 594.

Eminent domain.

Damages to an abutting lot by cutting down the grade of a street are held to require compensation under a Constitution providing compensation for taking, injuring, or destroying property for public use. (Ky.) 349.

A constitutional provision against taking or damaging property for public use without just compensation is held to apply to the first grading of a street, and to preclude such work without first ascertaining and paying, or tendering, the damages. (S. D.) 345.

A trolley railway on a street is held to constitute an additional burden by virtue of the exclusiveness and permanence of the appropriation of that portion of the street occupied by the poles and wires. (Neb.) 751.

The right to enter and remove gas pipes on abandoning a line which has become useless is held to belong to the gas company subject to the limitations that it must be done in the way least harmful to the landowner, and on payment for any actual injury to growing grain or grass, and, if the field be a meadow, for any substantial injury to the turf beyond opening and filling the trench where the pipe lay. (Pa.) 532.

See also infra, IV., VIII., and IX.

II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

The claim that a boom in a river was illegal is held to be no defense to the payment of just and reasonable compensation for catching ties, etc., in it, where the owner of these had been greatly benefited, and had acquiesced and even assisted in the maintenance of the boom. (W. Va.) 491.

A note given in renewal of one which was given to pay a debt in another state, where it was valid, even if held to be a contract of the latter state, is denied enforcement in a state in which it is contrary to public policy. (N. C.) 835.

Signing an instrument in which the amount is written in pencil, and leaving it with an agent to be delivered for a loan, are held not to be negligence, or to render the maker liable for the forgery to an innocent holder. (Cal.) 697.

Checks.

A bank taking a check instead of cash on a sale of stock for a principal, and then crediting him with the amount of it, is held liable to him if the check proves worthless, even if it used due diligence for its collection. (Pa.) 529.

After a check is made which constitutes an equitable assignment of a fund, and is presented by the holder, a bank is denied the right to appropriate the fund to its own claim against the depositor. (Ill.) 159.

In Illinois, where a check is regarded as an assignment of a deposit pro tanto, an arrangement by the drawer with the bank to prevent application of future deposits thereon is held invalid. (Ill.) 479.

Subscription.

A subscription to obtain the location of a college at or in a certain town is held not to require the institution to be placed within the corporate limits when many of the inhabitants live outside of them. (Ark.) 636.

Restraint of trade.

A combination of the owners of distinct patents for the purpose of restraining competition is held to be invalid. (C. C. App. 8d C.) 299.

Employment.

Want of mutuality in a contract for employment with an agreement to promote the employee according to a certain arrangement, and not to discharge him without cause, is held to leave the employer the right to discharge him at any time, where the employee is not bound to serve for any specified time. (Ark.) 467.

Suretyship.

The mere indorsement without recourse by the payee of a note made for discount at a certain bank, and the discount of the note at another bank, are held to release a surety on the note. (S. C.) 847.

The agreement of cosureties as to their relative and proportionate liability is held not to be within the statute of frauds. (Or.) 878.

Innkeepers.

Persons attending a club banquet at a hotel on the invitation and at the expense of the club, which had a contract to pay a certain price per plate, are held to have no right of action against the innkeeper for the loss of their hats which they left on the rack as they entered the dining room, although they had registered and been assigned rooms as guests. (N. H.) 760.

Lease.

A renewal of a lease with a covenant to deliver the premises in as good condition as they are then in is held to preclude the removal of trade fixtures, which the tenant had a right to remove at the expiration of the original term. (Ill.) 869.

Moving a building to another part of the same lot is held not to constitute an eviction of a tenant of the first floor so as to relieve him from payment of rent, if he retains possession. (Ill.) 156.

Original package.

A pine box in which sealed packages of cigarettes are packed for shipment is held to be the original package of commerce, although each of the sealed packages is held by the internal revenue department to be a proper and original package for the purpose of taxation. (Iowa) 484.

Carriers.

A person holding a free pass on a railroad, who gets on the front platform of a baggage car next the tender after the train has left the depot and is in motion, and then tries to get into the baggage car, is held not to have acquired the rights of a passenger if he is killed by a collision while still on the platform. (Ill.) 148.

A contract between a railroad company and a ticket broker, by which the broker is enabled to sell tickets for interstate transportation at less than the rates charged at the regular agencies of the company, is held invalid under the interstate commerce act of Congress. (Ga.) 275.

The bursting of a hogshead of molasses due to fermentation is held not to be a loss for which a carrier is liable, since it results from the operation of natural laws. (N. H.) 431.

A somewhat unusual case as to the liability of a carrier for unloading goods in a storm on an open platform and leaving them unprotected from the weather at a station where there is no building or any carrier's agent holds that this is not a fault on the part of the carrier, where the contract provided that the goods unloaded on such platform should be at the owner's risk. (Pa.) 535.

Insurance.

The surrender of the original policy in order to obtain a paid-up policy is held not to be a condition precedent under a contract which provides for such surrender. (Ky.) 504.

Benzine kept bottled in small quantities as a part of a stock of drugs and chemicals is held not to avoid a policy on such a stock of goods, although there is a stipulation against keeping benzine in the store. (Ark.) 789.

The intentional burning of a mortgaged building by a mortgagor to defraud the insurer is held to defeat the right of the mortgagee under a policy payable to him as his interest may appear. (Tenn.) 148.

Insurance on wearing apparel, jewelry, etc., while contained in a certain building, was held not to cover the property at another place where the family were temporarily staying in accordance with a habit known to the insurance agent. (Tex.) 545.

The fact that some portions of a burned building remain standing, and the lower floors are in condition to be used for rebuilding, is held insufficient to prevent the damage to the building from constituting a total loss under a valued policy. (Mo.) 819.

Failure to keep the covenants as to notice and proofs of loss, and bring suit on a policy within the limited time, where loss occurs after the death of the insured and before the appointment of the legal representatives, is held fatal, where reasonable efforts had not been made to secure the prompt appointment of such representatives, or other steps taken to keep the covenants. (N. Y.) 433.

Whether an accident or a disease was the cause of the death of a person insured against accident is held to be a question for the jury, unless the proofs are so convincing that all reasonable men, in the fair exercise of their judgment, must be led to the same conclusion. (Neb.) 826.

III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.

The lack of corporate existence of a company which has not paid the bonus tax which is, by statute, made a condition precedent to the exercise of any corporate powers, is held sufficient to defeat an action by such company on objection by the defendant. (Md.) 810.

Members of a corporation of another state are by a Florida decision held liable as partners for business done in that state without being incorporated therein. This seems impossible to reconcile with the great body of decisions as to recognition of foreign corporations, as the decision is not based on any statutory exclusion or declared public policy of exclusion, but on the general doctrine that incorporation in another state is insufficient to prevent partnership liability. (Fla.) 362.

The sale of delinquent stock of an irrigation company for assessments is held to give the purchaser the rights of an original subscriber, and to be unaffected by a by-law restricting transfers, since the purchaser takes from the corporation itself. (Cal.) 701.

The validity of a chattel mortgage executed by a foreign corporation in the state of its creation, as a preference to a creditor there residing, is to be determined by the law of the state in which the property is situated, when the corporation was insolvent. (Tex.) 254.

Loan association.

The legality of paid-up stock in a building and loan association is held not to be open to question by the holders of such stock, when it is not questioned by other parties, merely for the purpose of giving the former an advantage which they would not have if the stock had been valid. (Ill.) 202.

The deposit of securities by a foreign building and loan association as required by statute in order to get the right to do business in the state is held binding on the company, its stockholders, and receiver, and the proceeds thereof applicable to the resident creditors and shareholders in the first place, and the residue only payable to the receiver of the company appointed in the state of incorporation. (Wis.) 559.

Labor union.

The right of an unincorporated labor union to the protection of its union label is sustained under a Massachusetts statute, although a prior decision had held that such unions could not be protected against wrongful use of their labels. (Mass.) 508.

Stock exchange.

A by-law of a live-stock exchange limiting the number of solicitors that can be employed by any member is held void, and also a ground for forfeiting the franchise of the company. (Ill.) 878.

Limited partnership.

The right of a member of a limited partnership to purchase additional shares and have the rights of a member in respect of them is held limited by a rule which requires a re-election to membership in respect to such shares. (Pa.) 100.

IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS; PERSONAL CAPACITY.

Marriage in another state between a man and his paramour who go there to evade the laws of their domicil, which prohibit his marriage during the life of a former wife, is held invalid at their domicil. (Pa.) 539.

Five years' imprisonment under a conviction for crime is held to give the convict's wife the right to a divorce. (Ky.) 403.

An adopted child is held not to be a child or heir of the adopting parent within the meaning of a statute giving a remainder to children or heirs of a life tenant, under a deed to a person and his bodily heirs, where there was no law providing for adoption at the time of the enactment of such statute. (Mo.) 748.

Incompetency.

A judgment against an insane person, and a sale of his land thereunder were sustained where he was then going at large attending to his business, and no steps were taken to set them aside, even after the appointment of a committee two years later. (Ky.) 775.

An order for the temporary custody of a person alleged to be insane pending proceedings to determine his sanity is held to be an exercise of police power to guard against danger in an emergency, and not a deprivation of liberty without due process of law. (Conn.) 353.

One who drank largely of intoxicating liquors, and whose memory and will power were weakened, is held not to have had testamentary capacity of the highest order when undue influence is involved. (Pa.) 220.

See also infra, IX.

V. FIDUCIARIES.

See also infra, VII., Trusts.

Participation in a breach of trust by a bank is held to make it liable to the trust estate, where it places to the individual account of the trustee a check which was on its face for deposit to his account as trustee; but it is held otherwise as to a check for deposit to his account simply, although it includes a clause showing that it was for purchase money due him as trustee. (Md.) 84.

A dedication of land for a church lot or for religious purposes cannot be made to a municipality as trustee. (Ky.) 99.

VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES.

The naked assertion of the value of property, known to be false, is held insufficient to constitute an actionable deceit, though relied upon by the purchaser. (Conn.) 644.

False imprisonment.

A police judge is held liable for false imprisonment in ordering a person to be committed to jail merely on a telegram to the chief of police to arrest him. (Ky.) 210.

Libel.

To publish of a trader that he pleaded the statute of limitations, and to characterize this as dishonest, is held not to be libelous. (Iowa) 784.

Carrier's liability.

A conductor who beat a passenger who slapped his face with his hand is held to render the carrier liable, if he used force greatly in excess of what would seem necessary to a reasonable man in repelling the assault. (Ark.) 784.

Injury to a passenger by the breaking of a trolley wire, which comes in contact with him when it is charged with electricity, is held insufficient to render the carrier liable if there is no negligence on its part. (Md.) 161.

Permitting a car labeled "Powder" to stand so near a warehouse that firemen are deterred from attempting to put out a fire in the warehouse is held such negligence as to render the carrier liable, although there was no powder in the car. (C. C. App. 9th C.) 800.

Vendor's liability.

Negligence in the sale of cartridges similar to but in reality different from those asked for by a customer renders the seller liable for the damages caused by premature explosion of the cartridges when they were properly used. (Ga.) 607.

Master's liability.

The negligence of a foreman in a quarry in failing to give warning of a blast is held to be negligence in the duty of the master, and not that of a fellow servant. (N. J.) 884.

An injury to a telephone lineman from electricity escaping from an electric-railroad wire was held to be the result of his own negligence where his employer required him to test the wires for himself. His negligence after knowledge that the wires were unsafe was also held to prevent his reliance, as against the railroad company, on the assumption that it had done its duty in respect to them. (Conn.) 192.

Lessor's liability.

A sweeping provision in a lease exempting the landlord from liability for damages by fire, water, or otherwise, is held not to exempt him from liability for damage resulting from his own negligence in the use of heating apparatus remaining under his control. (R. I.) 246.

A landlord's re-entry and forcible ejection of the tenant after the lease has expired, but without excessive force, is held to give no civil remedy to the tenant unless it is provided by statute. (Ark.) 415.

Lessee's liability.

The keeper of a lodging house is held to have a right of action against a lodger for bringing disreputable people into his lodging rooms to the damage of the good name and business of the house. (R. I.) 773.

Railroad injury.

A license to use a railroad track as a foot-path, implied from its long use without objection, is held to impose care and diligence in running trains at that place. (Iowa) 899.

A switch about a mile from a railroad depot, to which a switch engine runs frequently and at irregular intervals without receiving orders as against other trains, is within depot grounds or yard limits so that it is not required to be fenced. (Mich.) 405.

Injury in street.

A light is held not to be required, as matter of law, on a platform made by a street-railway company during a freshet. (Or.) 517.

A water company having permission to place hydrants in streets and open them for flushing is held chargeable with the exercise of due care to avoid frightening horses. (Kan.) 90.

Riding a bicycle without a light or signal of warning, on a highway when objects can be seen only a few feet away, is held to be negligence precluding a recovery for a collision with a team. (Iowa) 488.

Other cases.

The death of a person, caused by stepping on a live electric wire which had fallen to the ground is held to raise a presumption, but not a conclusive presumption, of negligence or liability on the part of the electric company. (W. Va.) 499.

Injury caused by the falling of the head of an ax which flew from the handle while being used without negligence is held insufficient to show negligence. (Pa.) 842.

An unguarded door to an elevator in a store used by employees is held to be such an attraction to children that the owner may be liable to a child injured thereby, if the child was allowed to play on the premises. (Ill.) 112.

VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS; WILLS; LIENS; DEED.

A deed to a fictitious person is held to convey no title, but a deed of trust executed in the same name by the true owner of the property, who used his own Christian name as that of a fictitious person in both instruments, is held binding on him. (Tenn.) 428.

Wife's interest.

The inchoate interest of a wife in her husband's real estate, of which he is only a cotenant, under the Indiana statute, is held subject to defeat by a partition. (Ind.) 384.

Riparian rights.

The common-law doctrine of riparian rights is held applicable to the arid portions of the state of Washington, and the riparian owner is held to be protected against subsequent appropriation. (Wash.) 107.

Oil and gas.

That petroleum oil and natural gas are minerals within a reservation by deed is held in a case which also decides that possession of the land for agricultural purposes is not in itself adverse to the owner of the minerals. (Tenn.) 249.

An oil lease of infant's land is held to be a sale which can be made only in the manner prescribed for the sale of infant's real estate. (W. Va.) 292.

The right of a person to drill an oil well on his own lands is not limited by the fact that it is near the line of another person, and draws oil from the latter's lands. (Ohio) 765.

Coal.

Parol partition of the surface of land is held not, as matter of law, to extend to coal beneath, although in the absence of evidence it will be presumed to do so. (Pa.) 587.

Building on leased land.

The removal of a corner of a building to make room for an elevated railroad is held wrongful, and restoration required, when it is done by a company which has purchased a ninety-nine years' lease of the premises, under which the lessee erected the building and had the right to compensation therefor on the expiration of the lease, or in lieu thereof a renewal for an additional term. (C. C. App. 7th C.) 711.

Trade label.

The label of a cigar maker's union is held entitled to protection against use by unauthorized persons, although the union is a voluntary unincorporated organization which does not own the goods to which the label is affixed. (Ky.) 211.

Capital and income.

The decrease in value of bonds due to the wearing away of the premiums as the bonds approach maturity is held to be chargeable to the remaindermen rather than the life tenants under a will providing that the latter shall have the full income, where testatrix transmitted the bonds as she held them. (N. Y.) 280.

Trusts.

See also supra, V.

A bequest for masses to be said for the testator is sustained as a valid private trust, although not a charity. (Iowa) 204.

The execution of a power by a married woman under a trust deed made by her husband for herself and children, authorizing her to appoint a new trustee in case of vacancy, is held to be properly made by appointing him as trustee. (Fla.) 705.

An attempt to transfer property in trust so as to take it out of the reach of creditors, while retaining control of the income therefrom, is held invalid even if made by a married woman or a woman in contemplation of marriage. (Md.) 806.

Will.

An inoperative devise of land which testator did not own is held not an omission to provide for a child within the meaning of a statute giving a share as in case of intestacy. (Cal.) 689.

A ruling that the formal execution of a will is to be assumed, is held not to preclude the proponents from subsequently calling subscribing witnesses to prove it. (Mass.) 715.

Innkeeper's lien.

An innkeeper's lien is upheld on samples of a traveling salesman which belong to his employer. (Iowa) 291.

Vendor's lien.

Vendor's liens are held not to be adopted as part of the common law of Washington because inapplicable to the conditions of that state. (Wash.) 82.

Mortgage.

A claim for funeral expenses of a mortgagor of land is denied priority over the lien of the mortgage under a statute which requires the funeral expenses to be paid before distribution. (Ky.) 506.

The forgery of the satisfaction of a mortgage by a mortgagor who was allowed to take it merely for inspection, and fraudulently substituted a copy in place of it was held ineffectual to defeat the mortgagee's rights, even as against a bona fide purchaser of the premises relying on the record of the discharge. (Ga.) 95.

Warehouse receipts.

Warehouse receipts issued by a corporation on its own property, in its own possession, to secure its own debt, are held to be invalid, as such, and to be within the statute respecting the record of chattel mortgages. (Ind.) 725.

VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES.

The remedy on a note with warrant of attorney given by statute at the time they were made, by which a judgment could be entered and enforced notwithstanding any subsequent assignment for creditors, is held to be a part of the obligation which cannot be taken away by a statute providing that such an assignment shall dissolve all levies. (Wis.) 569.

A judgment pro confesso after striking out defendant's answer to punish him for contempt is held absolutely void, at least when rendered by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which had no right under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 725, to strike out such answer. (N. Y.) 449.

Election.

The retaking of property by a vendor who had retained title is held to preclude a subsequent action for the unpaid part of the purchase price. (Mich.) 815.

Garnishment.

Money or property taken from a prisoner under arrest, whether lawfully or unlawfully taken is held not subject to garnishment in the sheriff's hands, since if lawfully taken, it is in custody of law, and otherwise it was obtained by wrongful use of criminal process. (Mo.) 165.

Distress.

The right of distress is held not to pass to an assignee of a rent note, where the statute merely authorized the assignment of the rent and its recovery by the assignee. (Ky.) 403.

Ejectment.

The right to bring ejectment to compel the removal of telegraph poles which had been placed in a highway without compensation to the owner of the fee is sustained in favor of a subsequent purchaser of the land. (Ill.) 722.

Case.

Failure to pay over money collected for an employer is held to give no right of action by trespass on the case. (R. I.) 845.

Injunction.

An injunction against an action at law for which a release had been given and the specific performance of the agreement not to harass the complainant by such actions is held proper notwithstanding the release was an available defense at law, where the nature of the claims was such that the trial of the actions, although unsuccessful, would damage the defendant's reputation. (N. Y.) 240.

Appeal.

The insanity of a defendant in a divorce suit is held insufficient to prevent taking a writ of error from a decree against him, although he is incapable of making any personal election. (Ill.) 115.

Process.

Service of process on an officer of a foreign corporation who is only temporarily and casually in the state, when the company has never done business therein, is held insufficient to sustain a judgment in personam. (Wash.) 548.

Levy; exemption.

A combined harvester, although used by the owner to cut his neighbor's grain as well as his own, is held to be exempt from execution as 89 L. R. A.

an implement of husbandry or farming utensil. (Cal.) 840.

Evidence.

An oral agreement to show that the nominal maker of a note was only an agent and executed it under an agreement with the payee that he would look only to the principal is held inadmissible in favor of the agent when sued on the note. (Wash.) 473.

Damages.

The right to recover damages for mental suffering on account of delay in delivering a telegram is denied in an Arkansas case on a review of the conflicting decisions. (Ark.) 463.

Replevin.

Replevin for goods fraudulently purchased is sustained without any tender of a part payment which had been made, when the purchaser had realized from sales more than that amount. (C. C. E. D. Wis.) 579.

Partition.

Land subject to an easement of a right of way when owned in common by persons who have the easement is held subject to partition. (Mass.) 215.

See also supra, VII., Coal.

Action for death.

The "heir or heirs" intended by a statute defining the parties who may bring action for death are held equivalent to child or children, and limited to lineal descendants. (Colo.) 351.

Re entry on premises.

The owner of land which has been wrongfully entered upon by another person is held not to be liable for trespass in re-entering and taking possession of it. (Ky.) 863.

The right of a landlord to re-enter, if it can be done peaceably, and then maintain the possession by such force as is necessary, is sustained, where the tenant was in default and had been served with notice to terminate the lease; and in such case the legal proceedings to recover possession are held unnecessary. (Mich.) 410.

The right to maintain forcible entry when a person has been forcibly ejected from a possession lawfully obtained by one who has the present right of possession is denied under a statute expressly giving the right to a person entitled to possession. (Mass.) 418.

A man sixty-six years old is held entitled to an exemption from levy and sale of his property as an "aged or infirm person." (Ga.) 710.

Set-off.

A claim against a decedent's estate which was not due when the debtor died, but has become due before the commencement of an action, is held properly set off. (Cal.) 686.

Receivership.

A receiver of a trading corporation is appointed pending litigation between two factions each of which owns one half of the capital stock, when its affairs have come to a deadlock. (N. J.) 762.

The doctrine of equity which gives employees of a corporation a prior right to payment out of assets of a receiver in certain cases receives an extended discussion in a case which holds that the public nature of the corporation is not an element of the equity, but that a mining or manufacturing company is as much within the rule as a railroad company. (Ala.) 628.

IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE; HOLIDAY.

Monday, July 5, is held to be a holiday within the meaning of a statute against opening saloons on holidays. (Mich.) 218.

Insanity.

Insanity caused by the voluntary use of cocaine, morphine, and whisky is held to preclude an action for assault with intent to murder, although the statute provides that insanity from voluntary recent use of intoxicating liquor shall be no defense. (Tex.) 262.

Manacles.

The right of an accused person to appear in court without being manacled is held to be a common-law right, and his rights are also impaired by keeping manacles on others who have already been found guilty of the crime with which he is charged, when they are kept in the presence of the jury. (Wash.) 821.

Cruelty.

A dog is held to be a domestic animal within a statute as to cruelty,—especially where the Constitution provides for taxing domestic animals which are destructive of other property. (Ga.) 709.

Embezzlement.

A receiver is held not to be an agent within the meaning of a statute as to embezzlement. (Kan.) 860.

Evidence.

Evidence obtained by forcibly entering a house and searching it and the person of the owner is held admissible to show the possession of articles which tend to establish guilt, notwithstanding the unlawfulness and unreasonableness of the search. (Ga.) 269.

Opinions as to sanity are allowed by non-expert witnesses after giving full detail of the facts on which the opinions are based. (Tex.) 305.

Proof of insanity as a defense in a criminal case need be only by preponderance of evidence. It need not be sufficient to "satisfy" the jury of the insanity. (Ohio) 737.

Witnesses.

The obligation of expert witnesses to testify on payment of ordinary witness fees only is sustained against the contention that to compel them to give their opinions is a taking of their property without just compensation. (Ill.) 116.

Contempt.

The refusal to permit a person charged with contempt in publications respecting the evidence on a trial, to show that they were true, and to disprove the reporter's notes offered against him, is held to be a denial of due process of law. (Cal.) 691.

Jurors.

The fact that a juror did not know how to read or write the English language, although this was not known to the accused until after the trial, was held, overruling a prior decision, to be insufficient ground for a new trial. (Iowa) 302.

Costs and fees.

A statute making costs and fees of officers and witnesses in criminal cases depend on conviction is sustained against the contention that this denies the right to a fair trial which is involved in the constitutional right of trial by jury. (Tenn.) 126.

GENERAL INDEX

TO

OPINIONS, NOTES AND BRIEFS.

(Separate Index to Notes precedes this.)

ABANDONMENT. See ACTION OR SUIT, 2; GAS, 1.

ACTION OR SUIT. See also PARTITION, 2.

1. A right of action must be complete before the action is brought, and the subsequent occurrence of a material fact will not avail in maintaining it. Maryland Tube & I. Works v. West End Improv. Co. (Md.) 810

2. Failure to bring an injunction suit to prevent the changing of the grade of a street without making compensation for injury to the abutting owner is not an abandonment of the right to bring an action for such compensation after the change is effected. Henderson v. McClain (Ky.) 349

3. The delivery of a life-insurance policy which is void for failure to pay a premium is not a prerequisite to the institution of an action to obtain judgment for a paid-up policy in accordance with a provision of the policy, as such original policy is of no effect and can be of no value to any person. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Jarboe (Ky.) 504

4. A purchaser who was induced to make the contract by the false and fraudulent representations of the vendor may, acting seasonably, rescind the contract, after giving or tendering back what he has received, and recover back the consideration, or he may retain the land and recover damages for the deceit in a proper action. Gustafson v. Rustemeyer (Conn.) 644

5. The sole apparent maker of a note when sued thereon is not entitled to have his alleged principals brought in as defendants. Shuey v. Adair (Wash.) 473

ADOPTION. See DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION; PARENT AND CHILD.

ADULTERY. See SCHOOLS, 7.

ADVERSE POSSESSION.

Possession of land is not adverse to the owner of minerals therein, when the land is used merely for agricultural purposes, without any denial of the right to the minerals, or any assertion of claim inconsistent therewith. Murray v. Allard (Tenn.) 249

ALTERATION OF INSTRUMENTS. See also FORGERY.

1. The unauthorized alteration of an instrument by an agent with whom it is left to be delivered does not bind the principal. Walsh v. Hunt (Cal.) 697

2. An alteration of an obligation, amounting to forgery, by an agent of the maker, does not avoid the contract in its entirety or prevent a recovery by an innocent holder upon it in accordance with its original terms, if they can be ascertained. Id.

ANIMALS. See also CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 17, 19, 21; MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, 4.

1. Provisions for the summary destruction of dogs running at large contrary to statutes or ordinances are within the police power of the state. Hagerstown v. Witmar (Md.) 649

2. An ordinance prohibiting dogs from running at large on the streets and alleys of a city is within the general power to pass all ordinances necessary for good government and for the preservation of peace and good order and the protection of the lives and property of citizens. Id.

3. Dogs are domestic animals, within the meaning of Ga. Pen. Code, § 703, prohibiting cruelty to domestic animals, since they are classed as such by the constitutional provision authorizing a tax "upon such domestic animals as from their nature and habits are destructive of other property." Wilcox v. State (Ga.) 709

4. Favoritism of a society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, in respect to giving notice or warning to violators of an ordinance, does not constitute a defense to a prosecution instituted in the name of the state for such violation. State v. Karstendiek (La.) 520

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Animals; running at large as a nuisance. 874

APPEAL AND ERROR. See also JUSTICE OF THE PEACE.

1. The insanity of a defendant in a divorce 877 suit does not prevent maintaining a writ of error from a decree against him. Iago v. Iago (Ill.) 115

2. The next friend of an insane person in a writ of error is not necessarily the same person who represented him as guardian ad litem in the lower court, since the incapacity of the insane person to change his representative does not prevent the court from making the change. Id.

3. An order quashing a summons is appealable under a statute permitting appeals from orders terminating the action or proceeding. Carstens & Earles v. Leidigh & H. Lumber Co. (Wash.) 548

4. The amount in controversy is not material to the jurisdiction of the court of appeals of Kentucky when the title to land is involved. Stillwell v. Duncan (Ky.) 863

5. The amount in dispute on an appeal is the difference between the amount claimed and the amount recovered. Holker v. Hennessey (Mo.) 165

Effect of appeal.

6. The effect of a conviction of felony as a ground for disbarring an attorney is not annulled by a writ of error and supersedeas. Re Kirby (S. D.) 856

Dismissal.

7. Three weeks' delay in filing a brief for appellant in a criminal case will not require the dismissal of the appeal, when the delay was due to the removal of his attorney from the state, and the brief was filed as soon as the appellant, who was confined in jail, could procure it to be done after he learned that it was not done within the proper time. State v. Williams (Wash.) 821

Presenting questions.

8. Parties can preserve by exceptions any questions of law for decision as readily as by submitting propositions to be held as law, under Ill. Rev. Stat. 1893, chap. 117, § 1, providing that referees shall have authority to take testimony and report the same in writing together with their conclusions of law and fact, and that either party may except to such report. Sanitary Dist. v. Cook (Ill.) 869

9. The rejection of a hypothetical question involving assumptions concerning which no evidence has been offered is not ground of error. Porter v. Ritch (Conn.) 858

10. A general objection is not sufficient to raise the point that an instruction is slightly defective in form and may be misunderstood. Phenix Ins. Co. v. Fleming (Ark.) 789

11. The rejection of written evidence cannot be presumed on appeal to be prejudicial when the record does not show the nature of the evidence rejected. Modern Woodmen Acci. Assn. v. Shryock (Neb.) 826

What questions open.

12. The admission of a note in evidence without proof of its execution, when it was admitted by the maker, who was a defendant, cannot be complained of on appeal by another party as to whom the evidence was immaterial. Wiel v. Robertson (Tenn.) 428

13. One who has proved certain statements by his own witnesses cannot object to proof of the same statements by witnesses for the other party. Modern Woodmen Acci. Assn. v. Shryock (Neb.) 826

14. In the absence of proper exceptions to a finding on a mixed question of law and fact, the only question is whether the findings of fact warrant the conclusions of law. Carstens & Earles v. Leidigh & H. Lumber Co. (Wash.) 548

15. A finding by the court that testator had testamentary capacity, of the highest order is erroneous where the question of undue influence is also involved, if it appears that, possessed of property over $300,000 in value, he gave more than three fourths of it to one of his children, and for a period of ten years covering the time of the will he drank largely of intoxicating liquors and was afflicted with locomotor ataxia; while interested witnesses testify to the daily consumption of unusual quantities of intoxicants, and the failure of memory, and weakening of will power, although the evidence of incapacity is not sufficient to send the case to the jury. Re Miller (Pa.) 230

16. The facts may be reviewed by the supreme court of Illinois to the extent of ascertaining whether or not there was such evidence tending to establish plaintiff's declarations as should have been submitted to the jury, where error is assigned to the giving or refusal of an instruction to find for the defendant. Siddall v. Jansen (Ill.) 112

17. Negligence is a question of fact which cannot be reviewed on appeal unless the trial court failed to apply the correct standard of duty, or violated some rule or principle of law applicable to the facts as found. Bergin v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. (Conn.) 192

Questions first made on appeal.

18. The trial court cannot be convicted of error on appeal in excluding evidence which was not admissible for the purpose for which it was offered because it was admissible for purposes first suggested in the appellate court. Gustafson v. Rustemeyer (Conn.) 644

19. The objection that the amount of the judgment is in excess of the verdict cannot be taken for the first time on appeal. Greenville v. Ormand (S. C.) 847

20. The objection that the facts found show that plaintiffs have no cause of action cannot be raised on appeal under Conn. Gen. Stat. § 1135, where the appellant did not make any claim of that kind in the court below and does not make it in his assignments of error, but merely presents it in his brief. Gustafson v. Rustemeyer (Conn.) 644

Errors cured.

21. Error in taxing an item of costs is cured by promptly remitting that item. Second Ward Sav. Bank v. Schranek (Wis.) 569

22. Objection to the admission in evidence of a will because it is not proved by the subscribing witnesses is obviated by the subsequent calling and examination of the witnesses who testify to the execution of the will by the testator. Re Sketson's Will (Mass.) 715

Grounds of reversal.

23. Errors in rulings which could not affect the trial or decision will not be prejudicial. Bergin v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. (Conn.) 192

24. The failure of the court upon a trial without a jury to definitely adopt one of the two measures of damages contended for by the respective parties is not reversible error, where the application of either rule leads to substantially the same result. Gustafson v. Rustmeyer (Conn.) 644

25. Rejection of evidence is immaterial error if the complaining party has had the full benefit of it from another witness. Greenville v. Ormand (S. C.) 847

26. To permit an answer by an expert on a hypothetical question as to insanity, embracing only the evidence of one party, is not reversible error if both parties subsequently submit and obtain answers to questions containing all the evidence. Burt v. State (Tex.) 805

27. Failure to dispose of a special plea is not ground for reversal if the same defense was available under the other pleadings. Taylor v. Branham (Fla.) 862

28. The refusal of a proper instruction is not ground of reversal if it could not have been prejudicial. St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Jones (Ark.) 784

Judgment.

29. A dismissal of the complaint on the merits cannot be made by the appellate division on hearing exceptions upon a motion for a new trial under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1000, but if the exceptions are well taken the motion should be granted and the case sent back for a new trial; if they are not well taken, the motion should be denied and judgment entered on the verdict or order of nonsuit, as the case may be. *Matthews v. BANKS. See also ASSUMPSIT, 1; CHECKS.

1. A bank is not responsible for the use of trust funds made by a trustee unless it knowingly participates in the breach of trust or profits by the fraud. Duckett v. National Mechanics' Bank (Md.) 84

2. A check stating that it is for "deposit to the credit of" a person named, with the word "Trustee" added to his name, is an explicit notification to the bank in which he deposits it that he is not the actual owner of the money; and if the bank credits it to his individual account, and loss ensues to the trust estate by reason of his drawing out the fund by checks on his personal account, the bank is liable for participation in the breach of trust. Id.

3. A check stating that it is "for deposit to credit of" a person named, without adding the word "Trustee" to his name, although it contains a further clause stating that it is "the balance of purchase money due him as trustee," does not impress the funds with a trust, so as to prevent a bank in which he deposits it from crediting the check to his individual account. Id.

4. A ratification by a trustee of the act of a bank in placing to his individual credit a check which showed on its face that it was due to him as trustee cannot relieve the bank from liability to the trust estate, if the funds are lost by his checking them out on his personal account. Id.

5. After a check is given, the depositor cannot, in Illinois, by arrangement with the bank, prevent the application of future deposits to its payment. Gage Hotel Co. v. Union Nat. Bank (Ill.) 479

6. A bank to which a check is presented by a third person receiving it in the usual course of business cannot, where such check constitutes an equitable assignment of the fund, appropriate such fund after such presentation to the payment of a note held by it against the depositor and refuse to pay the check, if at the time of presentation it has taken no steps to appropriate the deposit to the payment of the note. Niblack v. Park Nat. Bank (Ill.) 159

7. That the controller of the currency has taken charge of a bank at the time of the presentation of a check by a third person holding it in the regular course of business does not authorize the application subsequent to such presentation of the fund to the payment of a note held by the bank against the depositor, as neither the controller nor the receiver appointed by him has any more right to transfer such fund than the bank itself. Id.

8. A bank receiving a check instead of cash, without authority from its principal, on a sale of his stock, and crediting his account with the amount of it, is liable to him therefor notwithstanding the fact that the check proves worthless, and irrespective of the question of its diligence in attempting to collect it. *Pepperday v. Bonds may be made payable in gold coin only, under Cal. act March 19, 1889, as amended in 1893, giving power to issue municipal bonds "payable in gold coin or lawful money," as this, to have any effect, must be construed—especially in view of other provisions of the statute—to give the city the option to make them payable in gold coin alone, or in lawful money. Murphy v. San Luis Obispo (Cal.) 444

2. The alternative of making interest payable annually or semi-annually need not be submitted to the voters on an election respecting the issue of municipal bonds under Cal. act March 19, 1889, § 3, requiring a notice of the election, the purpose and character of the bonds, and the rate of interest, without requiring any notice as to the time of paying interest. Id.

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS. See also CORPORATIONS, 11.

1. Notice of withdrawal from an insolvent loan association does not entitle members to priority of payment over their fellow stockholders. Gibson v. Safety Homestead & L. Assn. (Ill.) 202

2. The illegality of an issue of paid-up stock by a building and loan association cannot be asserted by stockholders who have taken it and paid for it in order to place themselves in a better position with respect to other stockholders, who do not question its validity, than they would be in if the stock had been valid. Id.

3. Securities deposited by a foreign building and loan association "in trust for the benefit and security of its members in this state," in order to obtain the right to do business in the state under the Wisconsin statute (Sanb. & B. Ann. Stat. §§ 2014a, 2014b), will be sold or collected in case of insolvency, and the proceeds applied according to the trust, and the residue only turned over to the receiver appointed in the state of incorporation. Lewis v. American Sav. & L. Assn. (Wis.) 559

4. Only resident shareholders and creditors are entitled to participate in the proceeds of securities deposited with the state treasurer by a foreign building and loan association under the Wisconsin statute (Sanb. & B. 1. A person must be expressly or impliedly received as a passenger before he can sustain that relation to a carrier. Illinois C. R. Co. v. O'Keefe (Ill.) 148

2. A conductor's knowledge that some one has boarded his train while in motion by getting on the platform between the tender and baggage car is not sufficient to show that he has accepted him as a passenger, when he does not know who the person is or what he is there for. Id.

3. The holder of a free pass on a railroad, who gets on the front platform of a baggage car next the tender when the train is in motion and after it has left the depot, and then tries to open the baggage-car door, does not thereby become a passenger so as to make the railroad company liable for his protection as such, when he is killed by a collision while he is on the car platform. Id.

4. The utmost care and diligence which human foresight can use is the measure of duty which a carrier owes to a passenger. Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. Nugent (Md.) 161

5. A conductor beating a passenger who slaps his face with his hand renders the carrier liable, if he uses force greatly exceeding that which would appear to a reasonable man necessary to repel the assault. St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Jones (Ark.) 784

6. An injury to a passenger on a trolley car by contact with a trolley wire charged with electricity, which breaks and falls over the rear end of the car, does not render the carrier liable if the accident was caused solely by a hidden or latent defect in the wire, which could not have been discovered or detected by any reasonable examination, unless the carrier has been in some way negligent in respect to the danger of such an accident. Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. Nugent (Md.) 161

7. A street-railway company which constructs a walk over a street temporarily submerged by a freshet, for the use of passengers in going from one car to another, is not, as matter of law, required to provide a light for such walk at night. Finseth v. City & S. R. Co. (Or.) 517

8. A street-railway company which, for the facilitation of its own business, constructs a platform along a street temporarily submerged during a freshet, for the accommodation of its passengers, is required to make such walk reasonably safe, but not to make it "as reasonably safe as possible." Id.

9. A person trucking goods for particular customers at prices fixed in each case by special contract is not a common carrier so as to be liable as an insurer of the goods. Faucher v. Wilson (N. H.) 431

10. A carrier is not liable for the loss due to the bursting of a hogshead of molasses by reason of fermentation, as this results from the operation of natural laws which a common carrier does not insure against. Id.

11. Permitting a car labeled "Powder" to stand in such close proximity to its warehouse as to deter the city fire department from attempting to extinguish a fire in the warehouse will render a carrier liable for the loss of goods in the warehouse which would not have been destroyed had the car not been there, although liability as carrier had ceased and there was in fact no powder in the car. Hardman v. Montana U. R. Co. (C. C. App. 9th C.) 300

12. The rule that a carrier must give notice to the consignee of the arrival of goods at destination is subject to exceptions growing out of special circumstances and out of customs that have grown up for the mutual advantage of shipper and carrier. Allam v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (Pa.) 585

13. A contract that goods shall be at the risk of the consignors when unloaded on a platform at a station where there is no building or any agent of the carrier is not against public policy. Id.

14. Unloading goods during a storm on an open platform and leaving them unprotected from the weather is not a fault of the carrier where there is no building at that station or any agent of the carrier, and the bill of lading provides that when delivered on the platform they are at the risk of the owner. Id.

2. A man who hires lodging rooms in a dwelling house is liable to the owner for injuries to the good name of the house and the damage to the owner's custom and business, if he brings dissolute and immoral persons to such rooms, and applies the rooms to the purposes of assignation or to create a nuisance therein. *Sullivan v. 1. The nonexercise by Congress of its power to regulate commerce among the states is equivalent to a declaration that such commerce shall be free from any restrictions. State v. Duckworth (Id.) 365

2. Restrictions on bringing sheep into the state by Id. Sess. Laws 1895, p. 125, and Id. Sess. Laws 1897, p. 115, appointing a sheep inspector, and making it unlawful to bring sheep into the state without his inspection and having the sheep dipped as provided in the statute,—constitute an unnecessary and unconstitutional burden upon interstate commerce. Id.

3. A pine box in which are packed for convenience in shipment packages of cigarettes, each of which contains ten cigarettes and is sealed with an internal revenue stamp, without any other packing or inclosure around or about them except the box itself, is the original package of commerce, and when that is opened the packages of cigarettes are subject to the police power of the state as a part of the common mass of property therein. McGregor v. Cone (Iowa) 434

4. The determination of the internal revenue department that a package is a proper and original package for purposes of taxation does not show that it is an original package of commerce. Id.

5. An original package is that package which is delivered by the importer to the carrier at the initial point of shipment, in the exact condition in which it was shipped. Id.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW. See also ANIMALS, 1; COURTS, 3; CRIMINAL LAW, 8, 4; EMINENT DOMAIN, 1; WITNESSES, 8.

1. A constitutional provision against taking or damaging property for public use without just compensation is self-executing. Searle v. Lead (S. D.) 345

2. The incapacity of the legislature to execute a power which is essentially and merely a judicial power, and of the judiciary to execute a power which is essentially and merely a legislative power, as well as the limitation of the meaning of legislative power by force of certain primary principles of government fairly embodied in the Constitution, and by the necessities involved in the separation and independence of distinct departments of government, is fundamental to the very existence of constitutional government as established in the United States. Norwalk Street R. Co.'s Appeal (Conn.) 794

3. The right to a fair trial involved in the constitutional provision for trial by jury is not infringed by a statute making the costs and fees payable to officers and witnesses in a criminal case depend on conviction, where this provision does not apply to the jury, and applies to a justice of the peace only in cases where his power is merely to bind over the accused for trial in a tribunal in which the justice has no voice. State v. Henley (Tenn.) 126

4. The legislature has unlimited power to act in its own sphere of legislation, except so far as restrained by the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the state. Id.

5. A statute which does not violate some provision of the Constitution cannot be annulled by the courts, whether its provisions are wise or unwise, or whether its operations be hurtful or beneficial. Id.

6. Ordinary services such as may be required of all citizens or officials by general or valid special laws are not particular services within the provision of Tenn. Const. art. 1, § 21, providing that no man's particular services shall be demanded without the consent of his representatives or just compensation. Id.

7. The property of an expert witness is not taken without just compensation, by requiring him to give his opinion as an expert without other compensation than ordinary witness fees. Dixon v. People (Ill.) 116

Vested rights.

8. A statute taxing the right already vested to take shares of an estate of a person who died before the act was passed, but which is yet subject to the control of the probate court and not yet distributed, is not an unconstitutional impairment of vested rights. State, Gelsthorpe, v. Furnell (Mont.) 170

Due process of law.

9. An order by a judge for the temporary confinement of a person alleged to be insane, pending proceedings for the determination of that question, is not a denial of due process of law when made on a written complaint and affidavit to the fact of insanity, but it is clearly within the police power of the state, and is for the restraint of a dangerous person in an emergency. Porter v. Ritch (Conn.) 353

10. Refusal to permit a man charged with contempt by publications respecting evidence in a judicial trial, to show in defense that the publications were true, and for this purpose to disprove the accuracy of the reporter's notes which have been offered against him, is such a deprivation of his constitutional right to make a defense as to be a denial of due process of law. McClatchy v. Sacramento County Super. Ct. (Cal.) 691

11. A statute making an employer's samples liable to a lien for hotel bills of his traveling salesman in whose possession they are does not deprive him of his property without due process of law. Brown Shoe Co. v. Hunt (Iowa) 291

12. A statute reducing the power of a city to levy taxes to pay a judgment does not deprive the owner of the judgment of his property therein without due process of law. Sherman v. Langham (Tex.) 258

13. A succession tax does not take property without due process of law when it is imposed on all property which passes by will or intestate laws except when the estate is less than $7,500. State, Gelsthorpe, v. Furnell (Mont.) 170

Equality.

14. A statute providing that the state or county will pay costs of criminal prosecutions only in certain classes of cases is not partial or class legislation. State v. Hanley (Tenn.) 126

15. A statute denying fees and costs or mileage to witnesses who reside within 5 miles of the place at which attendance is required, while allowing them in other cases, is not so unreasonable and capricious a classification of witnesses as to make the statute partial and unconstitutional. Id.

16. Discrimination between sheep brought into the state and those which are already therein, made by Id. Sess. Laws 1895, p. 125, and Id. Sess. Laws 1897, p. 115, requiring all sheep, whether healthy or not, to be dipped before they are brought into the state at any time of year, while sheep within the state are exempt from dipping between December 1 and the time when they are sheared in the following spring, and also exempting ewes with lambs between March 15 and May 15,—constitutes a violation of the equal privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states. State v. Duckworth (Id.) 865

17. Discrimination in favor of nonresidents of a town or city, by a statute granting them partial or entire exemption from penalties for allowing stock to run at large in the streets is not unconstitutional as a grant of any "exclusive or separate emoluments or privileges," or as a denial to any person of the equal protection of the laws., Broadfoot v. Fayetteville (N. C.) 245

18. An inheritance tax does not deny to anyone the equal protection of the laws because it exempts estates less than $7,500 each. State, Gelathorpe, v. Funnell (Mont.) 170

Police power, affecting property.

19. The private rights of property of the owners of animals are not infringed by an ordinance requiring that the animals shall not be cruelly treated in the public places of a city. State v. Karstendiek (La.) 520

20. An ordinance making it unlawful to sell fresh pork or sausage made thereof between June 1 and October is unreasonable and void, since it violates the inalienable right of man to procure food. Helena v. Dwyer (Ark.) 266

21. An ordinance providing that a dog seized while running at large shall be killed if not ransomed by payment of $1 before 10 o'clock of the morning after it has been detained twenty-four hours, and providing for a notice of the seizure to be given to the owner of any dog having a collar with the owner's name thereon, is not unconstitutional or so unreasonable that the court can hold it void. *Hagerstown v. 1. A physician duly subpoenaed and interrogated as an expert witness can be punished as for a contempt if he refuses to testify without receiving compensation other than ordinary witness fees. Dixon v. People (Ill.) 116

2. Locking the door of a court-room during the adjournment of court, and refusing to allow the judge of the court and his officers and the parties to the suit on hearing before him to enter the court-room at the time to which court was adjourned, is a contempt of court. *Dahnke v. CONTRACTS. See also ACTION OR SUIT, 4; BET; ESTOPPEL, 2; REPLEVIN.

1. A binding contract is made by a subscription to secure the location of a college at a certain town, when the required amount is subscribed, and the subscription accepted, and the college located at that place, while agencies are constituted and put to work to carry out the enterprise. Rogers v. Galloway Female College (Ark.) 636

2. No contract between a city and the holder of its bonds is created, with respect to the continued application of the revenues of gas works to a sinking fund, by an ordinance which, merely for the protection of the city, imposed on the trustees of the gas works the obligation of paying money into the sinking fund, where no pledge was made to the loan holders. Baily v. Philadelphia (Pa.) 837

3. A railroad engineer employed under a contract by which the employer agrees to pay him according to specified rates for his services, not to discharge him without just cause, to promote him according to specified grades of service, and when discharges of engineers are made to discharge in the order of juniority in service, may, in the absence of any agreement by the engineer to stay for any special time, be discharged at any time because of the want of mutuality, notwithstanding the implied undertaking on the part of the company to retain him in its service as long as he serves acceptably. *St. Louis, I. 5. A contract to establish a college "in" a certain town does not require it to be placed within the corporate limits when a large number of the inhabitants of the town dwell beyond such limits. Rogers v. Galloway Female College (Ark.) 636

6. A contract to establish a college "at" a certain town does not require that it should be placed within the corporate limits. Id.

7. A private understanding with one of four persons who make equal subscriptions, to the effect that other persons will raise and pay a part of his subscription, will not release one of the other four, where this agreement did not amount to a release of the subscriber from any part of his subscription. Id.

8. A subscriber to a fund to be given for securing the location of a college at a certain place on condition that a specified sum is raised cannot avoid his subscription by showing a deficiency in the amount after it has been accepted as sufficient by the party establishing the college, where he was a leading spirit in the enterprise, knew the subscribers, and knew what was demanded. Id.

9. A college established by a church pursuant to subscriptions and propositions therefor is the beneficiary of the subscriptions, standing in loco ecclesie as to the right to sue upon it. Id.

Validity.

10. If a provision in a contract for the employment of railroad engineers by which the employer undertakes to reinstate any engineer discharged from service whenever, upon his complaint, specified persons shall on investigation decide that the discharge was unjust, is void as against public policy, such provision does not render invalid a further provision in the contract that the engineers shall not be discharged without just cause. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Mathews (Ark.) 467

11. An action on a contract which is not only declared unlawful by statute, but is made a penal offense, cannot be maintained. Raleigh & G. R. Co. v. Swanson (Ga.) 275

12. A contract between a railroad company and a ticket broker, whereby the latter is enabled to sell tickets to individuals over the company's lines for interstate transportation at less than the established rate for the sale of tickets by its regular agents, between the same points and for the same accommodation, is in violation of the act of Congress of Feb. 4, 1887, to regulate commerce. Id.

13. The exposure of holders of patents covering similar articles to litigation will not justify them in making a combination in restraint of competition. National Harrow Co. v. Hench (C. C. App. 3d C.) 299

14. An agreement to sell no harrow for less than the schedule price is invalid when made by the owner of the patent with a corporation organized by rival manufacturers of harrows to take title to the patents and license the former owners to operate under them and sell only at schedule prices to be fixed by the corporation. Id.

15. Efforts to prevent competition to restrict individual effort and freedom of action in trade and commerce are restrictions hostile to the public welfare, not consonant with the spirit of our institutions and in violation of law. People, McIlhenny, v. Chicago Live-Stock Exch. (Ill.) 873

Impairing obligation.

16. A judgment upon a tort is not a contract, within the meaning of the constitutional provision against impairing the obligation of contracts. Sherman v. Langham (Tex.) 258

17. The remedy on promissory notes and warrants of attorney by statutes in force at the time that they were made, which authorized the holder to enter judgment, issue execution, and levy upon and sell the debtor's property notwithstanding any assignment for creditors which he might make more than sixty days after their issue, constitutes an essential part of the contracts or securities, and cannot be taken away by a subsequent statute which attempts to provide that all levies or other processes shall be dissolved by such an assignment. *Second Ward Sav. 1. The subjection of what purports to be a corporation but has no legal existence; as such because of the nonpayment of the bonus tax imposed by Md. act 1890, chap. 536, to a suit by the state for the recovery of the tax by Md. Code, § 88*h*, does not, by implication, give it a legal existence for all purposes, including a capacity to sue, as it is expressly denied the exercise of any corporate powers until the bonus is paid, by § 88*f*. Maryland Tube & I Works v. West End Improv. Co. (Md.) 810

2. The lack of the corporate existence of the plaintiff suing as a corporation can be set up to defeat the action by the defendant, where this is based on the failure of the plaintiff to pay the bonus tax prescribed by Md. Acts

1890, chap. 586, under which such nonpayment prevents the attempted corporation from having or exercising any corporate powers. Id.

8. The plea of ultra vires will not be allowed to prevail when it will not advance justice, but will, on the contrary, accomplish a legal wrong. Lewis v. American Sav. & L. Assn. (Wis.) 559

4. An extension of the business of a corporation into another state is within the power of the directors. Id.

By-laws.

5. By-laws providing that the transfer of the stock of an irrigation company shall be made only with the land for which it was issued do not apply to a sale of delinquent stock for assessments, as the purchaser is not a transferee of the former owner of the stock. Spurgeon v. Santa Ana Valley Irrig. Co. (Cal.) 701

6. The rights of a purchaser of delinquent stock sold for assessments must be determined by the general law, if no provision therefor is made by the charter or by-laws, and general provisions of a by-law as to transfer of shares of stock do not apply. Id.

Forfeiture.

7. An act of a corporation tending to produce injury to the public by affecting the welfare of the people is an abuse of its corporate franchise for which the charter of the company may be forfeited by an information in the nature of quo warranto. People, McIlhenny, v. Chicago Live-Stock Exch. (Ill.) 378

9. Members of a company incorporated in another state, who organize and choose directors in Florida and undertake to carry on the corporate business in that state without becoming incorporated therein, are liable as partners in the business. Taylor v. Branham (Fla.) 362

10. A corporation created under the laws of another jurisdiction cannot exercise corporate functions in Florida without becoming incorporated under its laws, and its liabilities contracted there while unincorporated therein rest upon its members or stockholders in the jurisdiction as partners. Id.

11. The compliance by a foreign building and loan association with the laws of the state which created it need not be investigated by the authorities of another state in which it deposits securities as required by statute in order to obtain a license to do business therein. *Lewis v. 2. A county is liable for the unauthorized and unlawful acts of its officials done colore officii, when it adopts and ratifies them and retains and enjoys the benefit thereof. Schussler v. Hennepin County (Minn.) 75

3. The maintenance of a county asylum does not become a private business such that the county is liable for injuries received by employees, by reason of the fact that some revenue is incidentally derived by the county from the sale of surplus farm products and from payments made by those liable for the support of insane persons kept in the asylum. Hughes v. Monroe County (N. Y.) 33

4. A county is not liable for injuries received by an employee from a defective machine in an asylum which was maintained by the county in discharge of its duty as a political division of the state to care for its insane. Hughes v. Monroe County (N. Y.) 33

5. No new liability for torts is imposed upon a county by a statute making it a municipal corporation for exercising the powers and discharging the duties of local government and the administration of public affairs, and providing that actions for damages for any injury to any property or rights for which it is liable shall be in the name of the county. Markey v. Queens County (N. Y.) 46

6. A county is not liable for the negligent exercise of the duty of maintaining bridges, imposed on it by the state, since it derives no special advantage from it in its corporate capacity. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Liabilities of counties in actions for torts and negligence:—(1.) Injuries to travelers and vehicles; (a) by bridges and approaches being out of repair; (1) implied liability; (2) where statute imposes liability; (b) from defective roads and highways; (c) where the injury was caused by the fright of a horse; (d) by negligence of employees; (II.) injuries to other persons: (a) from condition of buildings; (1) generally; (2) on account of escape from prison; (b) by negligence or wrongful act of employee; (III.) injuries to real property from public improvements: (a) generally; (b) by construction and operation of bridges; (c) by roads; (d) by ditches, canals, and dams; (e) by buildings; (IV.) other wrongful and negligent acts affecting persons or property: (a) generally; (b) affecting property; (V.) infringement of patents; (VI.) damages by defaulting officer; (VII.) by misapplication, conversion, or taking property; (VIII.) presentation of claims before county board as a condition precedent to suit; (IX.) summary. 88

2. The custody of a courthouse which the sheriff, as the court's executive officer, has, is the custody and care of the building as a courthouse, while as real estate simply it is in the care and custody of the county board, which controls the title and keeps it in repair. Id.

3. An assignment of the different courtrooms in the courthouse to the different judges of the courts of record is not within the power of the county board under statutes requiring the board to provide a courthouse and proper rooms and offices for the accommodation of such courts; but it rests with the judges of the courts to arrange among themselves how they will occupy the several courtrooms provided by the board. Id.

4. The power to manage county affairs, given to the county board by Ill. Const. 1870, art. 10, § 7, does not include the power to assign court rooms to the different judges of the courts of record. Id.

5. The assignment or transfer by a court of a town or city from one class to another, which Ky. Stat. §§ 8661, 8662, attempt to authorize, is in violation of Ky. Const. § 156, requiring the general assembly to make such assignments and transfers, and making no provision for delegating that power. Jernigan v. Madisonville (Ky.) 214

6. It is the duty of the court to overrule a decision or series of decisions, if clearly incorrect either through a mistaken conception of the law or through misapplication of the law to the facts, if no injurious results would follow from their overthrow. Jasper County v. Allman (Ind.) 58

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Liabilities of counties for injury to real property from. 69

DIVORCE. See HUSBAND AND WIFE, 4, 5.

DOGS. See ANIMALS, 1-8; CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 21.

DOWER.

1. The inchoate right of the wife of a cotenant of real estate is subject to the liability of the husband's estate to be devested by a partition sale. Haggerty v. Wagner (Ind.) 384

2. A wife's inchoate interest under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2652, in real property owned by her husband as a tenant in common, may be extinguished by a partition sale notwithstanding the Indiana statutes make no provision for the partition of her inchoate right and the courts are not authorized to direct the payment of any part of the proceeds to her upon such a sale. Id.

3. The inchoate right of a wife under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2652, in land held by her husband as a cotenant, may be barred by a partition sale in an action to which she was not a party, notwithstanding Ind. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2660, providing that no sale of the husband's property by virtue of any decree to which she shall not be a party shall affect her rights, as that section applies only where the wife is a necessary party, which she is not in such action. Id.

4. The effect of the deed in a partition sale is not reduced to that merely of co-owners so as to leave the property subject to the inchoate dower rights of their wives, by a statute providing that the conveyances shall bar all claims of such owners to said lands as effectually as if they themselves had executed the same. Id.

5. A statute providing that a judicial sale of a man's property in a suit to which his wife is not a party shall not prejudice her dower rights has no effect in case of a sale for partition of land in which he has an undivided interest, where another statute designating the persons to be made parties to partition proceedings does not recognize her as a necessary one. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Dower; inchoate interest of wife under statutes; effect of partition. 884

DRUMMERS. See INNKEEPERS, 2.

DRUNKENNESS. See also CRIMINAL LAW, 1.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

See also WILLS.

Drunkenness; municipal regulation of, as a nuisance. 524

EASEMENTS. See PARTITION, 8, 4.

EJECTMENT.

1. Ejectment may be maintained to compel the removal of telegraph poles from a public highway over plaintiff's land on which the line constitutes an additional burden for which compensation has not been made to the owner. Postal Telegr. Cable Co. v. Eaton (Ill.) 722

2. A transfer of land over which a telegraph line has been constructed without right gives the purchaser all his grantor's rights, including the right to bring ejectment. Id.

ELECTRICAL USES AND APPLIANCES. See also CARRIERS, 6; EVIDENCE, 8.

1. The breaking of a live electric wire which falls to the ground and causes the death of a person touching it does not render the owner liable, if it was due entirely to accident which no reasonable human care could prevent. Snyder v. Wheeler Electrical Co. (W. Va.) 499

2. The use of the same poles by a telephone company and an electric-railroad company, at the request of the municipal authorities, is not unlawful when it is not shown to be necessarily attended with increased danger. Bergin v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. (Conn.) 192

3. A telephone company may require its lineman to inspect and test for himself the guy wires or circuit breakers of an electric-railroad company, which uses the same poles that are used by the telephone company when it furnishes him with suitable appliances for that purpose, and he knows that there are no other persons employed to do such testing. Id.

4. The right of a telephone lineman to assume that an electric-railroad company has used suitable and safe appliances to prevent the escape of electricity from its main or trolley wire to the guy wires does not excuse him from exercising proper care to prevent injury, when he knows as a fact that the wires are not safe. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Electrical uses; negligence as to dangerous wires. 192

Electricity; use of, in street, as a nuisance. 621

ELECTRIC RAILWAYS. See EMINENT DOMAIN, 6, 9.

ELEVATED RAILROADS. See INJUNCTION, 5, 6.

ELEVATORS.

1. An ascending and descending cage of an elevator is such an attraction to children that an unguarded or open door or one which may readily be opened from the outside, may constitute negligence on the part of the owner when children are allowed to play where they may be injured by it. Siddall v. Jansen (Ill.) 112

2. Failure to comply with the provisions of an ordinance respecting the doors of elevators will render the owner liable for an injury received in consequence by a child which was rightfully at the place of the injury. Id.

EMBEZZLEMENT.

A receiver who unlawfully appropriates money which comes into his hands as receiver, or fails to account for or pay over the same on demand, is not within Kan. Comp. Laws 1889, ¶ 2220, providing that if any "agent" shall neglect or refuse to deliver to his "employer or employers," on demand, any money which has come into his possession by virtue of such employment, he shall on conviction be punished. State v. Hubbard (Kan.) 860

EMINENT DOMAIN. See also CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 1, 7; GAS, 1; INJUNCTION, 8, 9.

1. A liberal construction should be given to the constitutional provision for just compensation to the owners of property taken or damaged for public use. Searle v. Lead (S. D.) 345

2. Damages by the grading of a street in front of one's premises, although no prior grade had been established, are within the provisions of the Constitution against taking or damaging property without just compensation. Id.

3. No admission that any damage will be caused by the grading of a street is necessary to the filing of a petition by the city, under S. D. Acts 1891, chap. 94, providing for the ascertainment of damages before taking or damaging private property for public use. Id.

4. The ascertainment and payment of damages that may be caused by a change of grade of a street is a condition precedent to the right of the municipality to proceed under a Constitution providing for just compensation to the owners of property taken or damaged for public use. Id.

5. Damages for injuries caused to an abutting lot by being left 8 or 10 feet above the street by change of grade must be paid by the city to the lotowner, under a Constitution providing compensation for property taken, injured, or destroyed, for public use. Henderson v. McClain (Ky.) 849

6. Poles for a trolley railroad, set at stated distances on either side of tracks near the margin of a street, on which wires are placed, constitute an additional burden upon the street. Jaynes v. Omaha Street R. Co. (Neb.) 751

7. A telegraph line is an additional burden on the fee of a public highway, for which compensation must be made to the owner. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Eaton (Ill.) 723

8. The motive power which moves vehicles on a street does not determine whether or not an additional burden is imposed upon the easement, but that question depends on the exclusiveness and permanency of the occupation of any portion of the street. Jaynes v. Omaha Street R. Co. (Neb.) 751

9. The depreciation of the property of abutting owners by the exclusive use of a portion of the street by a trolley company's poles and wires gives a right to compensation under Neb. Const. art. 1, § 21, which provides that property shall not be "taken or damaged" for public use without just compensation. Id.

EQUITY.

An available legal defense to a pending action at law which is furnished by a valid release will not prevent equitable relief in favor of the defendant when the trial of the action at law might affect his reputation and character in the community by reason of charges and revelations as to his past conduct, whether real or fabricated, on which the action was based. Bomeister v. Forster (N. Y.) 240

ESTOPPEL. See also BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS, 2; CONTRACTS, 8; TRIAL, 11.

1. One will not be heard to deny the existence of a state of facts which he, either in express terms or by conduct, has represented as existing, and which he intended to be acted upon by another in a certain way, and which was so acted upon in good faith by the other to his detriment. Rogers v. Galloway Female College (Ark.) 636

2. The doctrine of estoppel does not apply to contracts which are forbidden by statute or contrary to public policy. Franklin Nat. Bank v. Whitehead (Ind.) 725

3. The doctrine of estoppel cannot be successfully invoked against the denial of corporate existence unless the corporation has at least a de facto existence. Maryland Tube & I. Works v. West End Improv. Co. (Md.) 810

4. A corporation is not estopped from denying that it is a warehouseman, or that its receipts, as such, are valid, as against a holder of them who took them with knowledge of the facts respecting the character and powers of the corporation. Franklin Nat. Bank v. Whitehead (Ind.) 725

5. A foreign corporation as well as its stockholders and receiver are estopped from disputing the validity of a trust upon which the corporation deposited securities as a condition of the license to do business in the state. Lewis v. American Sav. & L. Asso. (Wis.) 559

6. A party to an action who procures from the presiding judge a ruling that a specified judgment is valid and legal, as the result of which the case is adjudicated in his favor, is estopped in a subsequent litigation with the same adverse party to deny the validity or legality of such judgment. Luther v. Clay (Ga.) 95

EVICTION. See LANDLORD AND TENANT, 4.

EVIDENCE. See also APPEAL AND ERROR, 9, 11, 13, 18, 22, 25, 26; TRIAL, 2, 3, 5.

Judicial notice.

1. The source, course, and destination of the rivers of the state are a matter of judicial cognizance. People v. Truckee Lumber Co. (Cal.) 581

Presumptions and burden of proof.

2. The one alleging the unconstitutionality of a statute has the burden of substantiating his claim. Cook v. Fogarty (Iowa) 488

3. The common law is presumed, in the absence of proof, to prevail in a sister state which was once under the jurisdiction of England. Gooch v. Faucette (N. C.) 635

4. It is a reasonable presumption that a foreign corporation which has obtained a license by depositing securities which it had agreed to do and which the law required as a condition of the license did so in the manner and for the purposes prescribed by the law. Lewis v. American Sav. & L. Asso. (Wis.) 559

5. The presumption, from the fact of the partition of the surface of land by parol, is that it includes the coal beneath as well as the surface; and one who denies it has the burden of proof. Byers v. Byers (Pa.) 537

6. The mere happening of an accident is not sufficient to show negligence as between persons having no contract relations with each other if other evidence shows due care under the circumstances. Stearns v. Ontario Spinning Co. (Pa.) 842

7. An accident which in the ordinary course of things could not have happened if proper care had been used affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation, that it arose from want of care. Snyder v. Wheeling Electrical Co. (W. Va.) 499

8. The presumption of negligence from the breaking of a live electric wire and its fall to the ground is not final or conclusive, but may be repelled by evidence. Id.

9. A carrier has the burden of showing that its conductor, in beating a passenger in alleged self-defense, used no more force than appeared to him, as a reasonable man, necessary to repel the assault. St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Jones (Ark.) 784

10. The burden is on defendant in a murder trial in Ohio, who sets up insanity as a defense, to establish it by a preponderance of the evidence; but the proof should be deemed to preponderate in favor of insanity whenever its existence is made probable upon a full and fair consideration of all the evidence adduced for and against it. Kelch v. State (Ohio) 787

Best evidence.

11. A contractor for city work cannot state from memory the state of his accounts with the city at a certain time, when books showing such facts are accessible. Greenville v. Ormand (S. C.) 847

Documentary.

12. Legislative journals are competent evidence to show that a bill was not passed in accordance with mandatory provisions of the Constitution. Stanly County v. Snuggs (N. C.) 439

13. A properly authenticated record of conviction of crime in a Federal court may by statute be made admissible in a proceeding to disbar the accused as an attorney in a state court. Re Kirby (S. D.) 856

14. An agreed statement of facts upon which a case was tried without a jury, although not absolutely binding on the parties in a jury trial of another case between them involving the same issues, is admissible in evidence on the latter trial at the instance of one party against the other, subject to the latter's right to disprove, rebut, or explain any statement contained therein. Luther v. Clay (Ga.) 95

Demonstrative.

15. Evidence obtained by forcibly entering the house of an accused person and searching it and the person accused, without any warrant or authority of law, is not inadmissible to show the possession of articles tending to establish guilt, although the search and seizure may have been unlawful, unwarranted, unreasonable, and reprehensible. Williams v. State (Ga.) 269

Oral, as to writings.

16. Oral evidence is inadmissible to show that the maker of a note was only an agent. 89 L. R. A.

and signed it under an agreement with the payee that the principal only should be liable. Shuey v. Adair (Wash.) 478

17. Parol evidence is admissible to show fraudulent misrepresentations by the vendor as to the quantity of the land sold, though not in any manner incorporated in the deed consummating the contract. Gustafson v. Rustemeyer (Conn.) 644

18. A devise absolute in form cannot be shown by oral evidence to be in trust for other persons. Moran v. Moran (Iowa) 204

Opinions.

19. The opinion of a witness is of no value on the question whether or not a particular place at which there is a railroad switch, to which the switch engine frequently runs, is within the depot grounds or yard limits. Rabidon v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. (Mich.) 405

20. After one accused of murder has offered evidence of his demeanor for the purpose of convincing the jury of his insanity at the time of trial, for the purpose of raising the presumption of insanity when the crime was committed, a person who is acquainted with him may testify that he is simulating. Burt v. State (Tex.) 805

21. An opinion as to sanity may be given by a nonexpert witness who has given a very full detail of the facts upon which the opinion is based. Id.

22. A hypothetical question by contestant to an expert witness upon the question of incapacity of a testator need embrace only the facts which the evidence of the contestant tends to prove, and not those alleged by proponents, which he denies, or those which are irrelevant. Re Miller (Pa.) 220

23. Testimony that a person "looked very bad; he was lame and he could scarcely get up stairs," is not inadmissible on an issue as to his condition at a certain time. Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. Nugent (Md.) 161

Declarations; res gestæ.

24. Testimony of a defendant that he did not instruct his counsel in the matter, but that he acted altogether on the advice of the counsel, is admissible where he is charged with acting maliciously in making a complaint on which a hearing as to the insanity of another person was based. Porter v. Ritch (Conn.) 358

25. Sureties cannot testify to instructions to the maker as to the disposition of the notes against the holder unless he is shown to have knowledge of them. Greenville v. Ormand (S. C.) 847

26. The absence of the sureties on a note at the time of its attempted negotiation will not preclude testimony as to what then took place being given by one who, after the refusal of the payee to discount it, advanced money on the note which was committed by the sureties to the maker's hands for negotiation. Id.

27. Testimony that the members of a club considered a certain paper one of the strongest they had had read before them is incompetent as hearsay. Porter v. Ritch (Conn.) 358

Relevancy.

28. Evidence of acts of an agent of a defendant cannot be given under allegations of the performance of such acts by the defendant.

Id.

29. An allegation of a particular negligent act does not admit evidence of other acts causing the damage. Snyder v. Wheeling Electrical Co. (W. Va.) 499

30. An allegation that defendant did a particular act causing damage will admit evidence of all such incidental facts and circumstances of omission and commission as fairly tend to establish the negligence of the primary act. Id.

31. Evidence of the conduct constituting plaintiff's cause of action is not admissible in a suit by defendant to enforce specific performance of a contract of plaintiff to release the cause of action and refrain from bringing suit upon it. Bomeister v. Forster (N. Y.) 240

32. Evidence tending to show testamentary incapacity is admissible upon the question of undue influence in the obtaining of the will, although it may be insufficient to show want of capacity to make the will. Re Miller (Pa.) 220

33. A claimant of property levied on under execution issued in favor of the legal representative of the sole heir of the party who obtained the judgment cannot object to the admissibility of the execution in evidence on the trial of the claim case, on the ground that an order directing such execution to issue had been granted without service upon or notice to the defendant in the judgment. Luther v. Clay (Ga.) 95

1. An abandonment of a pipe line and the removal of the pipe may be made by a natural gas company which has laid its pipe in the exercise of eminent domain across the lands of other persons, when there is a failure of the supply of gas. Clements v. Philadelphia Co. (Pa.) 582

2. A right to enter and remove gas pipe without being liable as a trespasser belongs to a gas company which has condemned a right of way for its pipe line, where the supply of gas has failed; but this right must be exercised at the time and in the manner least harmful to the landowner and subject to the payment of compensation for any actual injury to growing grain or grass, and, if the field be a meadow, for any substantial injury to the turf beyond the mere opening and filling of the trench in which the pipe lay. Id.

1. The public holds the title to streets and alleys in trust for the use to which they are dedicated when the fee simple vests in the public on the platting of an addition to a city. Jaynes v. Omaha Street R. Co. (Neb.) 751

2. The title to streets and alleys, when land is surveyed and platted into an addition to a city in pursuance of Neb. Comp. Stat. 1897, chap. 14, art. 1, §§ 104-6, vests in the public. Id.

3. The right of the public to use the streets for the purpose of passage by such means as it may see fit to employ is given when streets are granted by a plat of an addition to a city, but this right of passage does not include the right to permanently and exclusively appropriate any portion of the street to the continued exclusion of the remainder of the public. Id.

4. A water company's permission to place hydrants in the streets and open them to flush its mains gives it no license or right to flush either at such times or in such manner as unnecessarily to impede travel or imperil the safety of those using the street, but it is under obligation to do the flushing with reasonable care and a due regard to the rights of others. Topeka Water Co. v. Whiting (Kan.) 90

5. An open hydrant from which water is thrown about 10 feet into the street with considerable noise and spray is calculated to frighten ordinarily gentle horses, and requires precautions and care for the protection and safety of those traveling on the street. Id.

6. A presumption that a street is reasonably safe for ordinary travel may be made by persons whose attention has not been called to any obstructions or perils, where the street is in constant use; and, while they must act with reasonable care, they are not required to keep their eyes continuously upon the pavement, watching for obstructions or pitfalls. Id.

7. A person who rides a bicycle without a light or other signal of warning in a public thoroughfare when he is liable to meet moving vehicles or pedestrians, at a time when objects can be discerned readily at a distance of but a few feet, is guilty of negligence. Cook v. Fogarty (Iowa) 488

1. A married woman can execute a power at common law without the concurrence of her husband, whether it was given to her while sole or married, and she can execute the power in his favor. Stearns v. Fraleigh (Fla.) 705

2. The execution of a power under a trust deed by a married woman need not be made with the formalities required for a conveyance. Id.

3. A wife can appoint her husband to be a trustee of property conveyed by him in trust for herself and children, where the deed of trust gives her the power to appoint and choose by her writing under seal another trustee in case of the resignation or death of the one first appointed. Id.

4. The lapse of five years after the conviction of a crime and sentence to imprisonment for life entitles the wife of the person convicted to a divorce, under Ky. Stat. § 2117, making it a ground for divorce that the parties had been living apart without cohabitation for five years before the application. Davis v. Davis (Ky.) 403

5. An action for divorce need not be brought within five years after the conviction for a felony of one sentenced to imprisonment for life, under Ky. Stat. § 2117, making "condemnation for felony" a ground for divorce, and Ky. Civ. Code, § 423, subs. 3, requiring plaintiff in a divorce suit to prove that the cause of divorce "occurred or existed within five years next before the commencement of the action." Id.

1. A proceeding for a hearing as to the insanity of a person is pending after a written complaint alleging the insanity is presented to the judge as required by Conn. Pub. Acts 1889, p. 88, and supported by an affidavit of a physician. Porter v. Ritch (Conn.) 353

2. A temporary provisional order for the custody of a person alleged to be insane, pending a hearing of the question as to his insanity, is not an adjudication, and is not void on its face because it fails to recite the affidavit of a physician on which it was based, or the fact that proceedings for a hearing as to the sanity were then pending. Id.

INJUNCTION. See also EQUITY; FISH-ERIES, 8.

1. An injunction against the plaintiff may be imposed as a condition of a similar injunction in his favor against the defendants limiting their power to make promissory notes or checks for a corporation of which they are directors and officers, and the affairs of which have come to a deadlock by dissensions between two factions, each of which owns one half of the capital stock. Sternberg v. Wolff (N. J. Err. & App.) 762

2. An injunction against actions on claims for which a valid release has been made may be granted when the trial at law might affect the reputation and character of the defendant in the community because of charges and revelations as to his past conduct, whether real or fabricated, on which the claims were based. Bomeister v. Forster (N. Y.) 240

3. Making the unlawful destruction of fish a misdemeanor and punishable as such does not preclude a civil proceeding to enjoin it as a nuisance. People v. Truckee Lumber Co. (Cal.) 581

4. Injunction may issue to compel the restoration by a railroad company of a portion of a building on a leasehold which has been acquired by it, and which, without making compensation therefor, it has removed to make space for the laying of its tracks. Base v. Metropolitan West Side Elev. R. Co. (C. C. App. 7th C.) 711

5. The right of a landlord to enjoin the construction of an elevated railroad in place of the corner of a building which had been removed by the railroad company as lessee is not affected by the fact that the lease is for ninety years, while the charter of the company is limited to fifty years, as new companies will undoubtedly be organized to which in succession the road and its equipment will be transferred, and the occupation is wrongful from the beginning. Id.

6. The right of a landlord to enjoin an elevated-railroad company owning a lease from locating its track in place of the corner of the building, which has been removed, is not affected by the fact that if the leasehold should be extinguished the company would be a trespasser if it did not remove its track, as it might abandon possession, leaving to the landlord the expense of removing and reconstructing the building, or, more probably, surrender possession only at the end of a litigation. Id.

7. Injunction will not be refused to prevent the destruction of a portion of a building because it is small and insignificant in comparison with the space that remains. Id.

8. A mere denial that plaintiff is entitled to any damages, while affirmatively showing that the work of grading a street in front of his premises is being done, is not such a denial of all the equities of his bill for an injunction as to justify the vacation of an injunction order. Searle v. Lead (S. D.) 845

9. An allegation of irreparable injury to plaintiff's property, or of the inability of the defendant to respond in damages, is not necessary for an injunction against grading a street in front of plaintiff's premises without paying him compensation for his damages, where the Constitution forbids taking or damaging his property without such compensation. Id.

Winchester* (N. H.) 760

INSURANCE. See also ACTION OR SUIT, 3; TRIAL, 9.

1. A liberal construction of an insurance policy, if it is a reasonable one and will prevent injustice, should be adopted when a liberal construction would lead to manifest injustice. Mattheus v. American C. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 433

2. A standard insurance policy, being prepared by insurers, should be construed, when the meaning is doubtful, most favorably to the insured. Id.

3. One insured under a policy entitling him to a paid-up policy in proportion to the premiums paid, after payment of three annual premiums, provided he surrenders the policy before making default or within six months after default in the payment of premiums, is entitled to a paid-up policy after making three payments although the original policy is not surrendered or a demand made for the paid-up policy within the six months after default if such demand is made during his lifetime. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Jarboe (Ky.) 504

4. Insurance on wearing apparel, jewelry, satchels, trunks, books, etc., "while contained in" a specified building, does not cover the property when located at another place where the insured was temporarily staying with his family, although the insurance agent knew of his habit to take his family periodically to such place for a temporary stay. British America Assur. Co. v. Miller (Tex.) 545

5. Statements contained in an application for insurance will not be warranties unless the provisions of the application and policy taken together leave no room for any other construction. Modern Woodmen Acct. Assn. v. Shryock (Neb.) 826

6. Liability for the full amount of a certificate for $3,000 insurance in a fraternal benefit association cannot be denied on the ground that the certificate limits the amount to the proceeds of an assessment of $2 on each member, where the association is forbidden by statute to issue a certificate for more than $1,000 if it has not a membership of 2,000. Id.

7. Benzine kept bottled in small quantities as part of a stock of drugs and chemicals does not avoid a policy on such a stock, although there is a stipulation against keeping benzine in the store. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Flemming (Ark.) 789

8. The fact that fireworks were on exhibition in a store when a policy of insurance was issued on the stock, or that one of a firm of agents which issued a policy soon after purchased fireworks at the store, is insufficient to show knowledge of the agent when issuing the policy that fireworks were kept in stock. Id.

9. A mortgagee of land cannot recover on an insurance policy taken out by the mortgagor, payable to the mortgagee "as his interest may appear," where the mortgagor burned the insured building for the purpose of realizing on the policy. Cocking v. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. 143

Waiver.

10. An insurance agent's knowledge acquired while attending to his own affairs, of the fact that fireworks are kept in an insured stock of goods, must have been present in his mind when the policy was issued, or some act done in the course of his duties as agent recognizing the continued validity of the policy, in order to make a waiver of a condition against keeping such articles. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Flemming (Ark.) 789

11. An adjuster's insistence upon strict proofs of loss, made in reply to a question if other proofs are necessary, does not waive any forfeiture that may have occurred. Id.

12. An insurer's demand of an exhibition of the books of the insured, and of proofs of loss, is not a waiver of any condition of the policy, where it provides for the right to make an examination of the books and that this shall not be treated as a waiver of any condition. Id.

Notice and proofs of loss.

13. In case of a loss by fire after the death of the original insured and before the appointment of a legal representative, those interested in the policy must make reasonable efforts to see that the covenants as to notice and proofs of loss are kept, and within a reasonable time must use such agencies as the law provides to secure that result. Mattheus v. American C. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 433

14. The appointment of a temporary representative who may take the necessary steps to prosecute a cause of action on an insurance policy within the period limited may be necessary in case of a loss occurring after the death of the insured, if the appointment of an executor or administrator cannot for any reason be secured with ordinary promptness. Id.

Total loss.

15. A building that has lost its identity and specific character as a building, and become so far disintegrated that it cannot be properly designated as a building, although some part of it may remain standing and the lower floors are in such condition that they could be safely used for rebuilding, is a total loss within the meaning of Mo. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 5997, requiring full payment of insurance in case of total loss. O'Keefe v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. (Mo.) 819

INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

1. Keeping open a saloon on Monday, July 5, is prohibited by Mich. Pub. Acts 1887, act No. 313, § 17, providing that all saloons shall be closed on "all legal holidays," and Mich. Pub. Acts 1893, act No. 185, designating July 4 as a holiday and providing that when such day falls on Sunday the next Monday following shall be deemed a public holiday for all or any of the "purposes aforesaid." People v. Thielman (Mich.) 218

2. The offense of keeping open a tippling house on the Sabbath day is sufficiently proved by showing that the owner of a dwelling house, on at least three different Sundays within the same year, sold whisky by retail to different persons, and permitted it, or a portion of it, to be drunk on the premises. *Williams v. 1. A judgment pro confesso after striking out defendant's answer to punish him for contempt, rendered by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which has, under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 725, no power to impose such punishment for contempt, is void on collateral attack. Hovey v. Elliott (N. Y.) 449

2. Reference to the caption or to the pleadings, process, and proceedings in a case, may be made in determining the sufficiency of the record of a judgment in respect to naming the parties. Taylor v. Branham (Fla.) 862

3. A judgment is not void for vagueness or indefiniteness, although it fails in the body thereof to give the names of the plaintiffs and defendants for and against whom it is rendered, where it gives the style of the cause at its head with sufficient definiteness to show without doubt that the plaintiffs and defendants referred to therein as such are the same individuals that are named and designated as such in the declaration and throughout the proceedings composing the record. Id.

4. A judgment against an insane person, and a sale of real estate in satisfaction thereof, will not be set aside long after on the ground of his insanity, if he was going at large and attending to his own affairs without objection up to the time of the sale, and, upon appointment of a committee for him two years later, no steps were taken to set aside the judgment, although he had no other property. *Spurlock v. LANDLORD AND TENANT. See also CASE, 2; DAMAGES, 3; INJUNCTION, 4-6.

1. The use of a defective appliance in a building by the landlord to the damage of a tenant may constitute actionable negligence on his part. Railton v. Taylor (R. I.) 246

2. The improper construction of a building or steam-heating apparatus therein does not give a tenant any right of action for negligence on account of damages caused thereby, when the condition has not changed during the tenancy. Id.

3. The lessor's own negligence in the management and use of that part of the premises remaining in his control, including the heating apparatus, is not within a stipulation that he shall not be liable for any loss to property on the premises if "destroyed or damaged by fire, water, or otherwise, or by the use or abuse of the Cochituate water, or by the leakage or bursting of water pipes, or in any other way or manner." Id.

4. Eviction of a tenant of the first floor of a building is not effected by moving the building to another part of the lot, so as to relieve him from the payment of rent if he retains possession of his rooms. Leiferman v. Osten (Ill.) 156

Distress.

5. The direction in a distress warrant to levy on property of subtenants found in the county is immaterial, when the levy is not in fact made on any property that is not found on the leased premises. Hutsell v. Deposit Bank (Ky.) 403

6. The right of distress does not pass to the assignee of a rent note, in the absence of statutory provision therefor, and is not given by Ky. Stat. § 2304, authorizing the assignment of the rent and its recovery by the assignee. Id.

Buildings; fixtures.

7. Trade fixtures erected by a tenant upon the leased premises during the term of the original lease cannot be removed after the expiration of the term of a new lease which contained no reservation of any right or claim of the tenant to the fixtures, and does not recognize his right to remove them. Sanitary Dist. v. Cook (Ill.) 389

8. The covenant in a new lease that the tenant will keep the premises in good repair and deliver them up in as good condition as they were when entered upon, prevents the removal at the close of the new term of trade fixtures placed on the premises by the tenant during the original term, where the new lease contains no reservation or recognition of such right, even if the right of removal would not be lost in the absence of such a covenant. Id.

9. A tenant has no right to remove a building placed by him upon the leased property under a stipulation requiring him to make the erection, keep it insured and in repair, and requiring the lessor to purchase it at the expiration of the term or to renew the lease for a specified time, at the expiration of which the title should pass to the lessor, and it is immaterial that a lien is reserved in favor of the lessor to enforce performance of the lessee's covenants. Bass v. Metropolitan West Side Elevator R. Co. (C. C. App. 7th C.) 711

10. The right to remove a small portion of a building to make room for railroad tracks is not acquired without condemnation proceedings by purchasing a ninety years leasehold with the assent of the lessor, although the building was erected by the tenant under a stipulation in the lease which required the lessor to make him certain compensation for it at the expiration of the lease, or renew it for forty years more, at the expiration of which 39 L. R. A.

the building should belong to the owner of the fee. Id.

Re-entry.

11. A landlord forcibly taking possession of the premises after the lease has expired, if he does not use excessive force, is not subject to a civil action by the tenant unless it is provided by statute. Vinson v. Flynn (Ark.) 415

12. A landlord who has peaceably regained possession during the temporary absence of a tenant who is in default and on whom notice has been served to terminate the lease may defend such possession against the tenant, if he uses no more force than is necessary. Smith v. Detroit Loan & B. Assn. (Mich.) 410

13. The landlord's common-law right of re-entry after default in payment of rent and notice served upon the tenant to terminate the lease, if such re-entry is made peaceably, is not abridged by How. (Mich.) Ann. Stat. §§ 8299 et seq., respecting legal proceedings to recover possession. Id.

2. A corporation cannot change accumulated earnings into capital, as between life tenant and remainderman, by its mere resolution, or conclude the courts on that question. McLouth v. Hunt (N. Y.) 230

3. Stock certificates for the accumulated earnings of a corporation represent profits belonging to life tenants of stock, rather than an increase of capital for the benefit of remaindermen. Id.

4. A decrease in the value of bonds by the lessening or wearing away of premiums on account of the bonds reaching maturity should be borne, as between life tenants and remaindermen, by the corpus of the estate, where the bonds were held by a testatrix and transmitted as she held them to trustees, with a direction that the life tenants should receive the full income. Id.

5. The only principle for determining the relative rights of life tenants and remaindermen in respect to the capital and income of trust property under a will is to ascertain the intention of the testator from the language used, the relations of the parties to each other, their condition, and all the surrounding facts and circumstances of the case. Id.

2. Petroleum oil is a mineral within a reservation by deed of "all mines, minerals, and metals in and under the land." Id.

3. Petroleum oil as it is found in the cavities of the rock is part of the realty and embraced in the comprehensive idea which the law attaches to the word "land." Wilson v. Hughes (W. Va.) 292

4. Petroleum oil is a mineral, and while in the earth forms parts of the realty; but when it reaches a well and is produced on the surface it becomes personal property and belongs to the owner of the well. Kelley v. Ohio Oil Co. (Ohio) 765

5. An oil lease investing the lessee with the right to remove all the oil in place in the premises, in consideration of giving the lessors a certain per cent thereof, is in legal effect a sale of a portion of the land and the proceeds represent the respective interests of the lessors in the premises. Wilson v. Hughes (W. Va.) 292

6. Whether petroleum percolates through the rock or exists in pools or deposits, it forms a part of that tract of real estate in which it lies for the time being; but when it leaves one tract and enters another it becomes a part of the realty of the latter, so that the owner of the former loses all right to the oil while it remains away from his land. Kelley v. Ohio Oil Co. (Ohio) 765

7. Neither a landowner nor one acquiring oil rights in his lands has a right of action because of the drilling and operation of wells upon adjoining lands which draw the oil from his lands, but his remedy is to drill wells along and near the division line so as to prevent the passage of such oil. Id.

2. A claim for funeral expenses of a mortgagor of land is not entitled to priority over the lien of the mortgage, under Ky. Stat. § 3868, providing that if the personal estate of a decedent is not sufficient to pay his liabilities the burial expenses shall be paid in full "before any pro rata distribution shall be made." Milward v. Shields (Ky.) 506

3. The lien of a mortgage on land is not affected by the act of the mortgagor to whom the mortgagee handed the mortgage at the former's request for the purpose of inspection only, in secretly and fraudulently substituting in its place a copy thereof, and forging upon the original an entry of satisfaction, by means of which he procures the cancellation of the record of the mortgage, where the mortgagee reposed no trust or confidence in the mortgagor and had no reason to suspect his fraudulent design, and was not negligent in failing to detect the fraud at the time of its perpetration or thereafter, even though the land has been purchased by a third person in the honest belief that the mortgage has been actually satisfied. *Luther v. 8. Consent to the levying by a board of a tax for a public library is not given by a vote adopting a statutory plan for such library by which the tax is to be levied by the common council, although the board subsequently provided for is to be appointed by the mayor with consent of the council. Id.

9. The supplying of gas for lighting purposes is not a municipal duty, either inherent or under the Pennsylvania act of 1885, which regulates the exercise of the municipal power on this subject. Baily v. Philadelphia (Pa.) 837

10. A lease of city gas works is not an interference with the executive functions of the department of public works, within the prohibition of Pa. act of June 1, 1885, art. 16, although by that statute the gas works are under the direction, control, and administration of that department. Id.

11. The inability of a common council to bind the discretion of its successors for a term of years, in respect to a municipal or governmental function, does not extend to a lease of city gas works in respect to which the city acts in a business capacity only. Id.

12. A provision of an ordinance leasing city gas works, that the city will not in any way interfere with, limit, restrict, or imperil the exclusive right thereby vested in the gas company, does not create a monopoly against public policy, where the franchise of the lessee is derived from the legislature, and not from the city, and it merely makes the privilege exclusive so far as the city is concerned. Id.

1. Negligence is relative, and cannot exist independently of some imposed or implied correlative duty essentially related to the particular circumstances. Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. Nugent (Md.) 161

2. Recovery cannot be had for an injury inflicted by the head of an ax falling from a door in the fifth story of a building into the areaway below if it flew from the handle while it was being used by a competent person who had used due care in inspecting the instrument and found no defect in it. Stearns v. Ontario Spinning Co. (Pa.) 842

3. Negligence in the sale of cartridges different from those which are asked for but similar in appearance renders the seller liable to the purchaser for damages caused by a premature explosion of the cartridges while he is properly using them. Smith v. Clarke Hardware Co. (Ga.) 607

4. Contributory negligence will prevent a recovery under a statute making one driving on a highway liable for the damages caused by his failure to turn to the right upon meeting another vehicle. Cook v. Fogarty (Iowa) 488

5. No duty rests upon one driving on a highway to turn out until he knew, or with reasonable care could have known that someone was approaching, under a statute making one failing to turn out liable for the damages resulting therefrom. Id.

6. Absence of negligence in failing to turn out upon meeting a traveler upon the highway in the night is shown by the fact that the driver was watching the horse and the road in advance for the purpose of seeing anyone who might be on the road, and did not see or hear anyone until a collision occurred. Id.

7. Negligence in failing to turn to the right upon meeting a traveler on the highway is not established by the mere fact that it would have been possible to discover his approach in time to do so. Id.

2. An ordinance declaring the emission of dense black or thick gray smoke to be a nuisance, without any limitation as to the length of time it is emitted, or as to whether it is in fact a nuisance or not, and without providing for any inquiry as to these matters, is not within the general power of a city to declare, prevent, and abate nuisances. Id.

3. Pollution of the water of a river by means of refuse from a saw mill, so as to destroy the fish therein, is a nuisance. People v. Truckee Lumber Co. (Cal.) 581

1. A parol partition of land may be limited to the surface, and does not, as matter of law, extend to coal in the ground if the intent was to retain this in common. Byers v. Byers (Pa.) 587

2. The interest of a woman in an undivided share of real estate held by her husband in common with others, which is contingent on her surviving him, does not bring her within the provisions of a statute authorizing persons to be made parties to partition proceedings who are "necessary to complete determination or settlement of the questions involved,"—especially where there is no authority to award her any of the proceeds of the sale. Haggerty v. Wagener (Ind.) 384

3. Land all of which is subject to an easement of a right of way is nevertheless subject to partition, if owned in common, under Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 178, § 1, providing that "tenants in common may be compelled to divide." Crocker v. Cotting (Mass.) 215

2. An averment of the receipt of "about $40,000" is not insufficient for indefiniteness. Id.

3. An allegation that the neglect to pay over money collected for an employer was with the intent to defraud does not change the neglect into a tort. Royce v. Oakes (R. I.) 845

4. A declaration for a private nuisance need not allege special damage, but a general claim for damages will sustain a recovery of such actual damages as are the natural and proximate consequence of the wrong. Sullivan v. Waterman (R. I.) 778

5. An allegation that acts constitute a nuisance is not necessary where the acts, as stated, amount to a nuisance in fact and in law. Id.

6. An allegation of a threat to "change the grade" of a street is fairly construed to mean a physical grading of the street, and not merely an ordinance establishing the grade. Searle v. Lead (S. D.) 345

7. The exception in favor of a postmaster whose annual compensation does not exceed $90, in Ind. Const. art. 2, § 9, prohibiting a person from holding more than one lucrative office at the same time, must be negatived in an allegation that a person holding another office has forfeited it by becoming a postmaster. Bishop v. State, Griner (Ind.) 278

8. A purchaser seeking to avoid the general rule that mere representations of value do not constitute actionable deceit must allege the specific facts which bring him within one of the exceptions to the rule. Gustafson v. Rustmeyer (Conn.) 644

9. The statute of limitations must be invoked by plea or answer in order to be available as a defense. Duckett v. National Mechanics' Bank (Md.) 84

PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS.

An ordinance precluding competition for a street-paving contract, by requiring the use of asphaltum which can be obtained only from premises owned and controlled by one private corporation, is void as against public policy in creating a monopoly, although the ordinance provides that the work shall be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder. *Fishburn v. 2. A switch about a mile from a railroad depot to which a switch engine runs frequently and at irregular intervals without receiving orders as against other trains, is within depot grounds or yard limits so that it is not required to be fenced. Rabidon v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. (Mich.) 405

3. A fence on one side of a railroad in front of a dwelling house, to prevent children from getting on the track cannot be required of a railroad company at a place at which it is not required to build a statutory fence with cattle guards and wing fences because it is within depot grounds or yard limits. Id.

4. The distance from depots and the frequency of use for switching purposes do not control in determining whether a certain point on a railroad a mile distant from the depot is or is not within the depot grounds or yard limits, so as to be exempt from the statutory provision as to fencing the railroad. Id.

5. A license to use a railroad track as a footpath may be found from the facts that it had been so used for a number of years to the extent that plainly visible paths had been worn upon the ground, and that a ladder had been placed from the highway to reach the road-bed with the knowledge of the employees of the road, to which no objection had been made. Thomas v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (Iowa) 399

6. Implied assent by a railroad company to the use of its tracks as a footpath will impose upon its employees the duty of exercising care, diligence, and watchfulness to discover if persons are on the track at that point, when running trains which will be likely to injure them if there. Id.

1. A receiver of a trading corporation may be appointed pending litigation over the man- 89 L. R. A.

agement and conduct of its business, when its affairs have come to a deadlock because of dissensions between two families each of which owns one half of the capital stock. Sternberg v. Wolff (N. J. Err. & App.) 762

2. Employees of a corporation in the hands of a receiver on foreclosure of a mortgage have a perfect equity to priority of payment for wages earned within six months before the receiver's appointment, when the funds from which they ought to have been paid have been used for the benefit of bondholders, even if the terms of the mortgage embrace income. Drennen v. Mercantile Trust & D. Co. (Ala.) 623

3. The public character of a corporation is not an element of the equity in favor of the priority of claims against a receiver for wages when earnings which should have been applied to them have been wrongfully diverted for the benefit of bondholders; but a manufacturing company or a mining company is subject to the rule as much as a railroad company. Id.

4. Claims [for the purchase price of the products of a corporation constituting a part of its gross earnings, and a part of which represents the labor of employees, constitute, in the hands of a receiver, a class of assets to which employees whose wages earned within six months are still unpaid have a claim prior to that of bondholders on foreclosure. Id.

5. Labor necessary to the continuation of the business of a corporation does not entitle the workmen to priority [of payment out of the assets of a receiver on foreclosure of a mortgage, if the labor is not shown to have been to the advantage of the bondholders or necessary in conservation of their interests, or if the receiver has not realized any income out of which the wages should be paid. Id.

6. Mere casual and incidental repairs to remedy defects caused by current use are not improvements or betterments within the rule which gives priority to wages out of the assets of a receiver of a corporation when funds that should have been used to pay wages have gone into improvements. Id.

7. A receiver may avoid an assignment of goods by way of mortgage, made by a corporation, on the ground that it was not recorded within the time required by law in order to make it valid "as against any other person than the parties. Franklin Nat. Bank v. Whitehead (Ind.) 725

The retaking by a vendor, as owner, of property sold by conditional sale with a reservation of title, and the giving of credit to the vendee for one half the invoice price of the property, retaining the instalments of purchase price paid, as the contract allowed, for the use of the property, will preclude an action for the balance of the purchase price on a note therefor, where this provides that the property may be retaken, and also that a suit on the note shall not waive the vendor's title to the property. *Perkins v. SCHOOLS. See also TAXES, 10.

1. School directors and boards of education have no authority to exclude children from public schools for refusal to submit to vaccination, unless in cases of emergency in the exercise of police power it is necessary, or reasonably appears to be necessary, to prevent the contagion of smallpox. Potts v. Breen (Ill.) 152

2. It will not be supposed that the legislature has by mere implication conferred on an administrative board power to require vaccination as a condition precedent to the exercise of the constitutional and statutory right of a child to attend school. Id.

3. Power to require children to be vaccinated as a condition of attending school is not given to a board of health by a statute providing that it shall have general supervision of the interests of health and life of the citizens, and shall have authority to make such rules and regulations as it may from time to time deem necessary for the preservation or improvement of the public health, when the remainder of the statute imposes and confers specific duties and powers by which the general language of the statute is limited. Id.

4. A contract of employment of a school superintendent is deemed to be for a year, unless there is something to show that it is for a less term. Freeman v. Bourne (Mass.) 510

5. There is an implied condition which authorizes the dismissal of a school superintendent, if circumstances arise which render him no longer able or fit to perform the duties of his position. Id.

6. The joint committee of towns which united under Mass. Stat. 1892, chap. 344, to employ a superintendent of schools and obtain a contribution therefor from the commonwealth, has authority to dismiss the superintendent for sufficient cause, and its authority does not cease with obtaining the contribution and employing the superintendent. Id.

7. The indictment of a school superintendent for adultery, and especially a verdict of guilty, will justify his dismissal, although the verdict is afterwards set aside and the prosecution dismissed, since not only good character, but good reputation, is essential to the greatest usefulness in his position. Id.

8. The right of women to vote at a school meeting for a director of a district, as provided by Or. Sess. Laws 1891, p. 130, is not precluded by Or. Const. art. 2, § 2, limiting the right to vote "at all elections authorized by law" to male citizens, as this is construed with the constitutional provision giving the legislature power to provide a system of common schools. *Harris v. STOCK AND PRODUCE EXCHANGE.

A by-law of a live-stock exchange limiting the number of solicitors that any member shall employ, with a provision for its enforcement by fines, suspension, or expulsion from membership, is an unlawful restriction on freedom of trade and business. People, McIlhany, v. Chicago Live-Stock Exch. (Ill.) 373

STREET RAILWAYS. See also CARRIERS, 6-8; COURTS, 4; EMINENT DOMAIN, 6, 8, 9; STREET SPRINKLING.

1. Turnouts built by a street-railway company in pursuance of permission granted by a city ordinance granting permission to the company to lay its tracks on specified streets and construct necessary switches and turn-outs are not such obstruction of the street as to warrant their summary and forcible removal by police intervention without notice or a hearing, unless it clearly appears that the authority has been exceeded. Cape May v. Cape May, D. B. & S. P. R. Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 609

2. A resolution by a city council declaring the turnouts of a street railway to be an unlawful obstruction, and directing the street committee to employ counsel and take legal measures to remove it, is not unreasonable, although permission had been granted by a city ordinance for the company to lay its tracks and construct all necessary turnouts. Id.

3. An ordinance directing the removal, without notice or a hearing, of a street-railway turnout 1,500 feet long, built in pursuance of an ordinance granting permission to the company to build necessary turnouts, is unreasonable, where two turnouts about 500 feet long had been built two years before and maintained without objection, and such turnouts had subsequently been connected by the construction of a turnout over the intervening 500 feet so as to make one continuous turnout. Id.

STREET SPRINKLING. See also MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, 3.

1. An ordinance requiring streets to be sprinkled from curb to curb by a street-railway company which runs cars through the street is invalid because it is not equal and uniform, but imposes an unjust and oppressive burden. State v. New Orleans City & L. R. Co. (La.) 618

2. An ordinance which is unreasonable in its entirety because it attempts to compel a street-railway company to sprinkle the whole width of a street cannot be upheld in part so as to require the sprinkling of the track. Id.

1. Uniformity in an assessment for taxes and in the mode thereof exists if the same basis of valuation is taken as to all property of like character. Kelley v. Rhodes (Wyo.) 594

2. A statute authorizing taxes on personal property, not secured by lien on real property, to be collected at the time of making the assessment before equalization, before levy for the year, and before the beginning of the fiscal year to which they belonged, with a provision for subsequently collecting or refunding any difference between the amount collected and that which ought to be paid, is not unconstitutional for lack of uniformity, since there is sufficient difference between secured and unsecured taxes to justify the discrimination in the procedure. Rode v. Siebe (Cal.) 342

3. The collection of taxes at an earlier date on personal property unsecured by lien on real property than upon other property, although the taxpayer thus loses the use of his money earlier than other taxpayers do, does not violate Cal. Const. art. 13, § 1, requiring property to be taxed "in proportion to its value." Id.

4. A return of property for taxation in another state does not exempt it from taxation, in the absence of a statute to that effect, if the property is otherwise legally taxable under the laws. Kelley v. Rhodes (Wyo.) 594

5. Hearing and opportunity for review of an assessment for a tax on sheep under Wyo. act 1895 is not denied, since a provision therefor under Wyo. Rev. Stat. § 3846, is applicable in such cases. Id.

6. A herd of sheep driven through the state is not exempt from taxation as personal property in transit, if the purpose of driving is not merely transportation, but comprehends also that of grazing and feeding them upon the natural grasses, not as a mere necessary incident of the travel, but as one of the purposes of the movement. Id.

7. The existence of a purpose to obtain grazing for sheep united with the purpose of transportation, is to be determined from all the facts in each case, including the course, the character of the territory grazed upon, the time employed, the subsequent method of intended shipment, the ordinary facilities for transportation by other means, the place selected for commencing other transportation, and perhaps the time of year and the eventual purpose of their shipment. Id.

8. The cost of reproduction is the proper basis for local taxation of a railroad under a system by which the franchise and personal property are assessable at the principal office of the corporation, so that the real estate alone is subject to assessment by the local authorities. People, Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., v. Clapp (N. Y.) 237

9. A county is a "municipal corporation" within the meaning of the proviso of Wyo. Rev. Stat. § 3055, respecting actions against municipal corporations to recover back taxes actually paid over to such corporation. Kelley v. Rhodes (Wyo.) 594

10. State and school district taxes are collected for the "use and benefit" of the county within the meaning of the proviso of Wyo. Rev. Stat. § 3055, authorizing action to recover back a tax actually paid over to any municipal corporation for whose use and benefit it was levied or collected. Id.

11. The rule of uniformity is not violated by a succession tax which exempts every state less than $7,500. State, Gelsthorpe, v. Furnell (Mont.) 170

12. A reasonable classification of property for taxation does not violate the rule of uniformity. Id.

13. The right to receive property, and not the property itself, is taxed by Mont. act March 4, 1897, imposing a tax on "all property" which shall pass by will or intestate laws, unless the estate is less than $7,500. Id.

2. Unincorporated associations of workmen, although not manufacturers or vendors of goods, are within the protection of Mass. Stat. 1895 for the prevention of the use of counterfeit labels and stamps of "any person, association, or union." Tracy v. Banker (Mass.) 508

3. An employee whose skilled labor creates a demand for a commodity that secures for him higher remunerative wages has as definite a property right to the exclusive use of a particular label, sign, symbol, brand, or device, adopted by him to distinguish and characterize said commodity as the product of his skilled labor, as the merchant or owner has to the exclusive use of his adopted trademark on his goods. Hetterman v. Powers (Ky.) 211

4. Voluntary, unincorporated labor organizations, composed solely of practical cigar makers, are entitled to the protection of a label adopted by them against use by an unauthorized person, although they do not own the cigars to which their label is affixed. Id.

5. Other manufacturers of cigars are not attacked by the blue label of the cigar makers' international union, declaring that the cigars to which it is affixed "are not the product of an inferior, rat-shop, coolie, prison, or filthy tenement-house workmanship." Id.

6. The fraudulent use of a trade union label before the passage of a statute giving such an unincorporated union a remedy for such use of its label does not give the wrongdoer any exemption from the statute. Tracy v. Banker (Mass.) 508

7. The illegality of some incident or particular of the purposes of a trade union will not deprive the union of the protection of the law for what would otherwise be its rights in respect to the use of a union label. Id.

8. The use of real labels in a fraudulent way is as unlawful, under Mass. Stat. 1895, chap. 462, as the use of counterfeit labels. Id.

1. An election for a trial by jury, required by the rules of court authorized by the amendment of 1892 to the Maryland Constitution, must be made by a separate and distinct act, and cannot be made by a demand in the declaration. Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. Nugent (Md.) 161

2. The trial court may receive evidence until the argument is concluded, whether in rebuttal or not. Burt v. State (Tex.) 305

3. Excerpts from standard works on medical jurisprudence cannot be read by counsel to the jury on the question of insanity in a murder trial. Id.

4. An hypothesis unsupported by evidence should not be submitted to the jury. Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. Nugent (Md.) 161

5. What acts, omissions, facts, and circumstances are competent evidence of damages to be considered by a jury are questions of law for the court, but whether they affect property and damage it, and the amount of such damages, are for the jury. Jaynes v. Omaha Street R. Co. (Neb.) 751

6. A question of the exercise of due care by persons driving a horse on a highway, which becomes frightened by the water from an open hydrant, is a question for the jury. Topeka Water Co. v. Whiting (Kan.) 90

7. Whether a child five years of age was a trespasser or not, when playing near an elevator in a store used by employees and reached through open doors from the main floor of the store, in which the father of the child was employed, is a question for the jury, if the child was rightfully in the store by invitation of the father. Siddall v. Jansen (Ill.) 112

8. It is a question of fact, and not of law, whether a purchaser of cartridges could by the exercise of reasonable care detect the fact that they were not the kind that he had asked for. Smith v. Clark-Hardware Co. (Ga.) 607

9. Whether an accident or a disease caused the death of a person whose life was insured against accident is a question for the jury unless the proofs are so convincing that all reasonable men, in the fair exercise of their judgment, would be brought to the same conclusion. Modern Woodmen Acci. Assn. v. Shryock (Neb.) 826

10. The question whether or not a will was procured by undue influence must be submitted to the jury when the evidence tends to show that for some time before it was made the testator had been addicted to the use of intoxicants to an unusual degree; and that the son to whom he gave three fourths of his property was always with him when he was intoxicated, and had said there was boodle in it for him; and that he had deliberately prejudiced his father against the other children and ingratiated himself in his favor, although he was not actually present when the will was made. Re Miller (Pa.) 220

Hunt* (N.Y.) 280

2. A conveyance to his successor by a trustee who resigns is not necessary in order to give the new trustee power to convey the title of the property on a sale authorized by the trust deed. Stearns v. Fruleigh (Fla.) 705

3. The power of a trustee to resign after acceptance may be conferred by the instrument creating the trust. Id.

4. A resignation of a trust already accepted, and not a refusal to accept it, is made by an instrument reciting that property is held in trust, and referring to the trust deed for further description thereof, and declaring that the trusteeship is thereby resigned and relinquished. Id.

5. A trust to place one's property beyond the reach of creditors, while retaining full enjoyment of the income and revenues therefrom through the instrumentality of a trustee, cannot be created even by a married woman or a woman in contemplation of marriage. Brown v. McGill (Md.) 806

1. A requirement of an ordinance that a vote for or against a bond proposition shall be indicated by writing, or causing to be written or printed the word "Yes" or "No" on the right-hand margin of the ticket opposite the proposition, is mandatory when the ordinance is authorized by and has the force of a statute, and therefore it is insufficient to mark a cross after the word "Yes" or "No" when both those words are printed opposite the proposition. Murphy v. San Luis Obispo (Cal.) 444

2. Two thirds of the votes cast on the proposition are sufficient, by the express terms of Neb. Laws 1897, chap. 24, respecting an election for a county exhibit at an interstate exposition, although the general provision of Neb. Comp. Stat. chap. 18, art. 1, §§ 27-30, is construed to require two thirds of the votes cast at an election held under those statutes. State, Douglas County, v. Cornell (Neb.) 513
